

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2010 with funding from Duke University Libraries

Charlotte Temple.

TALE OF TRUTH.

... Br. Mas. ROWSON,

LATE OF THE NEW THEATRE, PHILADELPHIA;

AUTHOR OF VICTORIA, THE INQUISITOR, FILLE DE CHAMBRE, &c.

She was her parents' only joy:
They had but one—one derling child.
ROMEO AND SULLEY.

YOL. I.

FIFTH AMERICAN EDITION.

HARRISBURGH, PENNSYL.
PRINTED FOR MATHEW CARET OF PHILADELPHIA,
BY JOHN WIETH.
1802.

"IT moy be a Tale of Truth, for it is not unnatural; and it is a tale of real distress... Charlotte, by the artifice of a teacher, recommended to a school from humanity rather than a conviction of her integrity, or the regularity of her former conduct. As enticed from her governess, and accompanies a young officer to America. The marriage ceremony, if not forgotten, is postponed, and Charlotte dies a martyr to the inconstancy of her lover and treachery of his friend.-The situations are artless and affecting-the description natural and pathetic. "We should feel for Charlotte, it such a person ever existed, who, for one error scarcely, perhaps, deserved so severe a punish. If it is a fiction, poetic justice is not, we think, properly distributed." - Crit. Review April 1791, page 468.

PREFACE.

For the perufal of the young and thoughtless of the fair fex, this Tale of Truth is defigned; and I could wish my fair readers to confider it as not merely the effusion of Fancy, but as a reality. The circumstances, on which I have founded this novel, were related to me fome little time fince, by an old lady who had personally known Charlotte, though flie concealed the real names of the characters, and likewise the place where the unfortunate. fcenes were acted: yet as it was impossible to offer a relation to the public in fuch and imperfect state, I have thrown over the whole a flight veil of fiction, and fubflituted names and places according to my own fancy. The principal characters in this little tale are now! configned to the filent tomb: it can therefore hurt the feelings of no one; and may, I flatter myself, be of service to some who are fo unfortunate as to have neither friends to advise, nor understanding to direct them, through the various and unexpected evils that attend a young and unprotected woman in her first entrance into life.

While the tear of compaffion still trembled in my eye for the fate of the unhappy Charlotte, "I may have children of my own," faid.

I, "to whom this recital may be of use."

"And if to your own children," faid Benevolence, "why not to the many daughters of Misfortune, who, deprived of natural friends, or spoiled by a mistaken education, are thrown on an unseeling world without the least power to defend themselves from the snares not only of the other fex, but from the more dangerous arts of the profligate of their own?"

Sensible as I am, that a novel writer, at a time when such a variety of works are ushered into the world under that name, stands but a poor chance for same in the annals of literature, but conscious that I wrote with a mind anxious for the happiness of that sex whose morals and conduct have so powerful an influence on mankind in general; and convinced that I have not written a line that conveys a wrong idea to the head, or a corrupt wish to the heart, I shall rest satisfied in the purity of my own intentions, and if I meritnot applause, I feel that I dread not censure.

If the following tale should fave one hapless fair one from the errors which ruined poor Charlotte, or rescue from impending misery the heart of one anxious parent, I shall seel a much higher gratification in reflecting on this trifling performance, than could possibly result from the applause which might attend the most elegant finished piece of literature, whose tendency might depraye the heart, or mislead the understanding.

Charlotte Temple:

SHAPTER I.

timost involved will pulled off their bala. A

To we will be stone sand File I see .

A BOARDING SCHOOL Hand to

ARE you for a walk," faid Montraville, to his companion as they arofe from table; "are you for a walk?" or shall we order the chaife and proceed to Portsmouth?" Belcour preferred the former; and they sauntered out to view the fown, and to make remarks on the inhabitants, as they returned from church.

Montraville was a Lieutenant in the army:
Belcour was his brother officer: they had been to take leave of their friends previous to their departure for America, and were now returning to Portfmouth, where the troops waited orders for embarkation. They had stopped at Chichester todine; and knowing they had sufficient time to reach the place of destination before dark, and yet allow them a walk, had resolved, it being Sunday afternoon, to take a survey of the Chichester ladies as they returned from their devotions.

They had gratified their curiofity, and were preparing to return to the inn without honoring any of the belles with particular notice, when Madame Du Pont, at the head, of her school, descended from the church. Such an aftemblage of youth and innocence naturally attracted the young foldiers: they. stopped; and, as the little cavalcade passed, almost involuntarily pulled off their hats. A. tall, elegant girl looked at Montraville, and blushed: he instantly recollected the features. of Charlotte Temple, whom he had once feen. and danced with at a ball at Portfmouth. At: that time he thought on her only as a very lovely child, fhe being then only thirteen; but the improvement two years had made in her perfor, and the blush of recollection which fuffuled her cheeks as the passed, awakened in his bofom new and pleafing ideas. Vanity led him to think, that pleafure at again beholding him, might have occasioned the emotion he had witnessed; and the fame vanity led him to wish to fee her. again. - interior of the strength of marge

med from the [&]quot;She is the fiveetest girl in the world," faid he, as he entered the inn. Belcour stared.

"Did you not notice her?" continued Montraville of the had on a blue bonnet, and with a pair of lovely eyes of the same colour, has contrived to make me feel devilish odd about the heart."

"Poh," faid Belcour, "a mustet-ball from our friends the Americans, may in less than two months, make you feel worse."

"I never think of the future," peplied. Montraville; "but am determined to make the most of the present, and would willingly compound with any kind Familiar, who would inform me who the girl is, and how I might be likely to obtain an interview."

But no kind Familiar at that time appearing, and the chaife, which they had ordered, driving up to the door, Montraville and his companion were obliged to take leave of Chichester and its fair inhabitant, and proceed on their journey.

But Charlotte had made too great an impression on his mind to be easily eradicated having therefore, spent three whole days in thinking on her, and endeavoring to form some plan for seeing her, he determined to set off for Chichester, and trust to chance either to savor or frustrate his designs. Arriving at the verge of the town, he disnounted, and sending the servant forward with the horses, proceeded toward the place, where in the midst of an extensive pleasure ground, stood the mansion which contained the lovely Charlotte Temple. Montraville leaned on a broken gate, and looked carnessly at the house. The wall, which surrounded it, was higher and perhaps the Argusses, who guarded the Hesperian fruit within, were more watchful than those samed of old.

and bus

"Tis a romantic attempt," faid he; and fliould I even fucceed in feeing and converting with her, it can be productive of no good: I must of necessity leave England in a few days, and probably may never return; why then should I endeavor to engage the affections of this lovely girl, only to leave her a prey to a thousand inquietudes, of which at present she has no idea? I will return to Portsmouth, and think no more about her."

The evening was now closed; a serene still-ness reigned; and the chaste Queen of Night, with her silver crescent, faintly illuminated the hemisphere. The mind of Montraville was hished into composure by the serenity of the surrounding objects. "I will think on herono more," said he, and turned with an intention to leave the place; but as he turned, he saw the gate which led to the pleasure grounds open, and two women come out, who walked arm-in-arm across the field.

"I will at least see who these are," said he. He overtook them, and giving them the compliments of the evening, begged leave to see them into the more frequented parts of the town; but how was he delighted, when, waiting for an answer, he discovered under the concealment of a large bonnet, the face of Charlotte Temple.

He foon found means to ingratiate himself-with her companion, who was a French teacher at the school, and, at parting, slipped a letter he had purposely written, into Charlotte's hand, and five guineas into that of Mademoiselle, who promised she would endeavor to bring her young charge into the field again the next evening.

ego and entering lardier of it and entire ita concert me of a maga homest, the fact of larter from the

If some in the control of the contro

CHAPTER II.

has bolder if your right off to fault

DOMESTIC CONCERNS.

and the state of the said Nr. Temple was the youngest fon of a nobleman, whose fortune was by no means adequate to the antiquity, grandeur, and, I may add, pride of the family. He faw his elder brother made completely wretched by marrying a difagreeable woman, whose fortune helped to prop the finking dignity of the house; and he beheld his fifters legally prostituted to old, decrepit men, whose titles gave them consequence in the eyes of the world, and whose affluence rendered them fplendidly miserable. "I will not facrifice internal happiness for outward show," faid he: "I will feek Content; and, if I find her in a cottage, will embrace her with as much cordiality as I should if scated on a throne."

Mr. Temple possessed a small estate of about five hundred pounds a year; and with that he resolved to preserve independence, to marry where the feelings of his heart should direct him, and to confine his expenses within the limits of his income. He had a heart open to every generous feeling of humanity, and a hand ready to dispense, to those who wanted, part of the blessings he enjoyed himself.

As he was univerfally known to be the friend of the unfortunate, his advice and bounty were frequently folicited; nor was it feldom that he fought out indigent merit, and raifed it from obscurity, confining his own expenses within a very narrow compass.

- "You are a benevolent fellow," faid a young officer to him one day; "and I have a great mind to give you a subject to exercise the goodness of your heart upon."
- "You cannot oblige me more," faid Temple, "than to point out any way by which I can be ferviceable to my fellow creatures."
- "Come along then," faid the young man,
 "we will go and vifit a man who is not in fo good a lodging as he deferves; and, were it not that he has an angel with him, who comforts and fupports him, he must long since have funk under his misfortunes." The young man's heart was too full to proceed;
 and Temple, unwilling to irritate his feelings by making further enquiries, followed him in filence, till they arrived at the Fleet prison.

The officer enquired for Captain Eldridge. A person led them up several pair of dirty stairs, and pointing to a door which led to a miserable, small apartment, said that was the Captain's room, and retired.

The officer, whose name was Blakeney, tapped at the door, and was bid to enter by a voice melodiously fost. He opened the door, and discovered to Temple a scene which rivetted him to the spot with astonishment.

The apartment though finall, and bearing flrong marks of poverty, was neat in the extreme. In an arm-chair, his head reclined upon his hand, his eyes fixed on a book which lay open before him, fat an aged man in a Lieutenant's uniform, which, though threadbare, should sooner call a blush of shame into the face of those who could neglect real merit, than cause the hectic of confusion to glow on the cheeks of him who wore it.

Beside him sat a lovely creature, busied in painting a san mount. She was fair as the lily; but sorrow had nipped the rose in her cheek, before it was half blown. Her eyes were blue; and her hair, which was light brown, was slightly confined under a plain muslin cap, tied round with a black ribbon; a white linen gown and plain lawn handker-chief composed the remainder of her dress; and in this simple attire, she was more inte-

vol. 1.

fiftibly charming to fuch a heart as Temple's, than fhe would have been, if adorned with all the fplendor of a courtly belle.

- When they entered, the old man arofe from his feat, and shaking Blakeney by the hand with great cordiality, offered Temple his chair; and there being but three in the room, feated himself on the side of his little bed, with evident composure.

"This is a strange place," said he to Temple, "to receive visitors of distinction in; but we must sit our seelings to our station. While I am not ashamed to own the cause which brought me here, why should I blush at my situation? Our missortunes are not our faults; and were it not for that poor girl......"

Here the philosopher was lost in the father. He rose hastily from his seat, walked towards the window, and wiped off a tear which he was asraid would tarnish the cheek of asailor.

Temple cast his eye on Miss Eldridge; a pellucid drop had stolen from her eyes, and sallen upon a rose she was painting. It blotted and discoloured the slower. "'Tis emblematic," said he mentally: "the rose of youth and health soon sades when watered by the tear of assistion."

- "My friend Blackeney," faid he, address, ing the old man, "told me I could be of fervice to you: be so kind, then, dear Sir, as to point out some way in which I can relieve the anxiety of your heart and encrease the pleasures of my own."
- "Youknownot what you offer. While deprived of my liberty, I cannot be free from anxiety on my own account; but that is a trifling concern; my anxious thoughts extend to one more dear a thousand times than life: I am a poor, weak, old man, and must expect in a few years to fink into silence and oblivion; but when I am gone, who will protect that fair bud of innocence from the blasts of adversity, or from the cruel hand of insult and dishonour?"
- "Oh, my father!" cried Miss Eldridge, tenderly taking his hand, "be not anxious on that account; for daily are my prayers offered to heaven that our lives may terminate at the same instant, and one grave receive us both; for why should I live when deprived of my only friend?"

Temple was moved even to tears. "You will both live many years," faid he, "and I hopefee much happiness. Cheerly, my friend, cheerly; these passing clouds of adversity will serve only to make the funshine of prosperity more pleasing. But we are losing time: you might ere this have told me who were your creditors, what were their demands, and other particulars necessary to your liberation."

"My flory is fhort," faid Mr. Eldridge; but there are fome particulars which will wring my heart barely to remember; yet to one whose offers of friendship appear so open and disinterested, I will relate every circumstance that led to my present painful situation. But my child," continued he, addressing his daughter, "let me prevail on you to take this opportunity, while my friends are with me, to enjoy the benefit of air and exercise. Go, my love; leave me now; to morrow at your usual hour I will expect you."

Miss Eldridge impressed on his cheek the kiss of filial affection, and obeyed.

ry her; but offered to release me immediately, and make any settlement on her, if George would persuade her to live, as he impiously termed it, a life of honor.

- "Fired at the infult offered to a man and a foldier, my boy struck the villain, and a challenge ensued. He then went to a coffee-house in the neighborhood, and wrote a long, affectionate letter to me, blaming himself severely for having introduced Lewis into the samily, or permitted him to confer an obligation, which had brought inevitable ruin on us all. He begged me, whatever might be the event of the ensuing morning, not to suffer regret or unavailing forrow for his sate, to encrease the anguish of my heart, which, he greatly seared was already insupportable.
- "This letter was delivered to me early in the morning. It would be in vain to attempt describing my feelings on the perusal of it; suffice it to say, that a merciful Providence interposed, and I was for three weeks insensible to miseries almost beyond the strength of human nature to support.
- "A fever and strong delirium seized me, and my life was despaired of. At length, nature, overpowered with satigue, gave way to the salutary power of rest, and a quiet slumber of some hours restored me to reason, though the extreme weakness of my spame prevented my feeling my distress so acutely as I otherwise should.

- "The first object that struck me on awaking, was Lucy sitting by my bedside; her pale countenance and sable dress prevented my enquiries for poor George: for the letter I had received from him, was the first thing that occurred to my memory. By degrees the rest returned: I recollected being arrested, but could no ways account for being in this apartment, whither they had conveyed me during my illness.
- "I was fo weak as to be almost unable to fpeak: pressed Lucy's hand, and looked earnessly round the apartment in search of another dear object.

Where is your mother?" faid I faintly,

- "The poor girl could not answer: she shook her head in expressive silence; and throwing herself on the bed, solded her arms about me, and burst into tears.
 - "What! both gone," faid I.
- "Both," fhe replied, endeavoring to reftrain her emotions: "but they are happy, no doubt."

Here Mr. Eldridge paufed: the recollection of the scene was too painful to permit him to proceed:

CHAPTER IV.

CHANGE OF FORTUNE.

"T was fome days," continued Mr. Eldridge, recovering himfelf, "before I could venture to enquire the particulars of what had happened during my illness : at length I assumed courage to ask my dear girl, how long her mother and brother had been dead: fhe told me, that the morning after my arreft, George came home early to enquire after his 'mother's health, staid with them but a few minutes, feemed greatly agitated at parting, but gave them first charge to keep up their spirits, and hope every thing would turn out for the best. In about two hours after, as they were fitting at breakfast, and endeavoring to strike out some plan to attain my liberty, they heard a loud rap at the door, which Lucy running to open, fhe met the bleeding body of her brother, borne in by two men who had lifted him from a litter, on which they had brought him from the place where he fought. Her poor mother, weakened by illness and the struggles of the preceding night, was not able to support this shock: gasping for breath, her looks wild and haggard, the reached the apartment where they had carried her dying son. She knelt by the bed-side; and taking his cold hand, 'my poor boy,' said she, 'I will not be parted from thee: husband! fon! both at once lost....Father of mercies spare me!'----She fell into a strong convulsion, and expired in about two hours. In the mean time, a surgeon had dressed George's wounds; but they were in such a situation as to bar the smallest hopes of recovery. He never was sensible from the time he was bro't home, and died that evening in the arms of his sister.

- "Late as it was when this event took place, my affectionate Lucy infifted on coming to me. 'What must be feel,' said she, 'at our apparent neglect, and how shall I inform him of the afflictions with which it has pleased heaven to visit us?'
- "She left the care of the dear departedones to fome neighbors, who had kindly come in to comfort and affift her; and on entering the house where I was confined, found me in the fituation I have mentioned.
- "How fhe supported herself in these trying moments, I know not: heaven, no doubt, was with her; and her anxiety to preserve the life of one parent in some measure abated her affliction for the loss of the other.

"My circumstances were greatly embarrassed, my acquaintance sew, and those sew utterly unable to assist me. When my wise and son were committed to the kindred earth, my creditors seized my house and surniture, which not being sufficient to discharge all their demands, detainers were lodged against me. No friend stepped forward to my relief; from the grave of her mother, my beloved Lucy sollowed an almost dying father to this melancholy place.

"Here we have been nearly a year and a half. My half-pay I have given up to fatisfy my creditors, and my child fupports me by her industry: fometimes by fine needlework, fometimes by painting. She leaves me every night, and goes to a lodging near the bridge: but returns in the morning, to cheer me with her fmiles, and blefs me by her duteous affection. A lady once offered her an afylum in her family; but she would 'We are all the world to not leave me. each other,' faid she, 'I thank God, I have health and spirits to improve the talents with which nature has endowed me; and I truft, if I employ them in the support of a beloved parent, I shall not be thought an unprofitable fervant. While he lives, I pray for strength to purfue my employment; and when it pleases heaven to take one of us, may it give the furvivor fortitude to bear the separation with due refignation; till then I will never leave him. vol. 1.

- "But where is this inhuman perfecutor?" faid Temple.
- "He has been abroad ever fince," replied the old man; "but he has left orders with his lawyer never to give up the note till the utmost farthing is paid."
- "And how much is the amount of your debts in all?" faid Temple.
 - "Five hundred pounds," he replied.

Temple flarted: it was more than he expected. "But fomething must be done," said he: "that sweet maid must not wear out her life in a prison. I will see you again to-morrow, my friend," said he, shaking Eldridge's hand: "keep up your spirits: light and shade are not more happily blended than are the pleasures and pains of life; and the horrors of the one serve only to encrease the splendor of the other."

- "You never loft a wife and fon," faid Eldridge.
- "No," replied he, "but I can feel for those that have." Eldridge pressed his hand, as they went toward the door, and they parted in silence.

When they got without the walls of the prison, Temple thanked his friend Blackeney for introducing him to fo worthy a character; and telling him he had a particular engagement in the city, wished him a good evening.

"And what is to be done for this distressed man?" said Temple, as he walked up Ludgate Hill. "Would to heaven I had a fortune that would enable me instantly to discharge his debt; what exquisite transport, to see the expressive eyes of Lucy beaming at once with pleasure for her father's deliverance, and gratitude for her deliverer: but is not my fortune assumence," continued he, "nay, superstuous wealth, when compared to the extreme indigence of Eldridge? and what have I done to deserve ease and plenty, while a brave worthy officer starves in a prison? Three hundred a year is surely sufficient for all my wants and wishes; at any rate, Eldridge must be relieved."

When the heart has will, the hands can foon find means to execute a good action.

Temple was a young man, his feelings warm and impetuous; unacquainted with the world, his heart had not been rendered callous by being convinced of its fraud and hypocrify. He pitied their fufferings, overlooked their aults, thought every bofom as get nerous as his own, and would cheerfully have divided his laft guinea with an unfortuinate fellow creature.

No wonder, then, that fuch a man, (without waiting a moment for the interference of Madam Prudence) should resolve to raise money sufficient for the relief of Eldridge, by mortgaging part of his fortune.

We will not enquire too minutely into the motive which might actuate him in this inflance: fuffice it to fay, he immediately put the plan in execution; and in three days from the time he first faw the unfortunate Lieutenant, he had the superlative felicity of seeing him at liberty, and receiving an ample reward in the tearful eye and half articulated thanks of the grateful Lucy.

"And pray, young man," faid his father to him one morning, "what are your defigns in vifiting thus conftantly that old man and his daughter?"

Temple was at a loss for a reply: he had never asked himself the question: he hesitated and his father continued....

"It was not till within these few days that I heard in what manner your acquaintance first commenced, and cannot suppose any thing but attachment to the daughter could carry you such imprudent lengths for the sather; it certainly must be her art that drew you in to mortgage part of your fortune."

- "Art, Sir!" cried Temple eagerly....
 "Lucy Eldridge is as free from art as fhe is from every other error: fhe is......"
 - "Every thing that is amiable and lovely," faid his father, interrupting him, ironically; no doubt, in your opinion fhe is a pattern of excellence for all her fex to follow; but come, Sir, pray tell me, what are your defigns toward this paragon? I hope you do not intend to complete your folly by marrying her."
 - "Were my fortune fuch as would support her, according to her merit, I don't know a woman more formed to ensure happiness in the married state."
 - "Then prithee, my dear lad," faid his father, "fince your rank and fortune are fo much beneath what your Princess might expect, be fo kind as to turn your eyes to Mifs Weatherby; who, having only an eftate of three thousand a year, is more upon a level with you, and whose father yesterday solicited the mighty honor of your alliance. I shall leave you to consider on this offer; and pray remember, that your upion with Mifs Weatherby will put it in your power to be more liberally the friend of Lucy Eldridge."

The old gentleman, walked in a stately manner out of the room; and Temple stood almost petrified with assonishment, contempt and rage.

EHAPTER V.

SUCH THINGS ARE.

Miss Weatherby was the only child of a wealthy man, almost idolized by her parents, stattered by her dependants, and never contradicted even by those who called themselves her friends: I cannot give a better description than by the following lines:

The lovely maid whose form and face
Nature has deck'd with every grace,
But in whose breast no virtues glow.
Whose heart ne'er felt another's woe,
Whose hand ne'er smooth'd the bed of pain,
Or eas'd the captive's galling chain:
But like the tulip caught the eye,
Born just to be admir'd and die;
When gone, no one regrets its loss,
Or scarce remembers that it was.

Such was Miss Weatherby; her form lovely as nature could make it, but her mind uncultivated, her heart unfeeling, her passions impetuous, and her brain almost turned with flattery, dislipation and pleasure; and such was the girl, whom a partial grandsather left independent mistress of the fortune before mentioned.

She had feen Temple frequently; and fancying fhe could never be happy without him, nor once imagining he could refuse a girl of her beauty and fortune, she prevailed on her fond father to offer the alliance to the old Earl of D——, Mr. Temple's father.

The Earl had received the offer courteoully: he thought it a great match for Henry; and was too fashionable a man to suppose a wife could be any impediment to the friendship he professed for Eldridge and his daughter.

Unfortunately for Temple, he thought quite otherwise: the conversation he had just had with his father, discovered to him the situation of his heart; and he found that the most affluent fortune would bring no increase of happiness unless Lucy Eldridge shared it with him; and the integrity of his own heart, made him shudder at the idea his sather had started, of marrying a woman for no other reason than because the affluence of her fortune would enable him to injure her by maintaining in splendor the woman to whom his heart was devoted: he therefore refolved to refuse Miss Weatherby, and, be the event what it might, offer his heart and hand to Lucy Eldridge.

Full of this determination, he fought his father, declared his resolution, and was commanded never more to appear in his presence. Temple bowed: his heart was too sull to permit him to speak; he left the house precipitately, and hastened to relate the cause of his forrows, to his good old friend and his amiable daughter.

In the mean time, the Earl, vexed to the foul that fuch a fortune should be lost, determined to offer himself a candidate for Miss Weatherby's favor.

What wonderful changes are wrought by that reigning power, ambition! the love-fick girl, when first she heard of Temple's refusal, wept, raved, tore her hair, and vowed to found a protestant nunnery with her fortune; and commencing abbess, to shut herself up from the fight of cruel ungrateful man for ever.

Her father was a man of the world: he fuffered this first transport to subside, and then very deliberately unfolded to her the offers of the old Earl, expatiated on the many benefits arising from an elevated title, painted in glowing colours the surprise and yexation of Temple when he should see her siguring as a Countess and his mother-in-law, and begged her to consider well before she made any rash vows.

The distressed fair one dried her tears, listened patiently, and at length declared she believed the surest method to revenge the slight put on her by the son, would be to accept the father: so said so done, and in a few days she became the Countess D——.

Temple heard the news with emotion: he had loft his father's favor by avowing his passion for Lucy, and he saw now there was no hope of regaining it: "but he shall not make me miserable," faid he, "Lucy and I have no ambitious notions: we can live on three hundred a year for some little time, till the mortgage is paid off, and then we shall have fufficient not only for the comforts but many of the little elegancies of life. We will purchase a little cottage, my Lucy," said he, "and thither, with your reverend father, we will retire; we will forget that there are fuch things as fplendor, profusion and dissipation: we will have fome cows, and you fhall be queen of the dairy; in a morning, while I look after my garden, you shall take a basket on your arm, and fally forth to feed your poultry; and as they flutter round you in token of humble gratitude, your father shall fmoke his pipe in a woodbine alcove, and viewing the ferenity of your countenance, feel fuch real pleafure dilate his heart, as shall make him forget he has ever been unhappy."

Lucy fmiled: and Temple faw it was the fmile of approbation. He fought and found a cottage fuited to his tafte; thither, attended by Love and Hymen, the happy trio retired, where, during many years of uninterrupted felicity, they cast not a wish beyond the little boundaries of their own tenement. Plenty, and her handmaid, Prudence, presided at their board; Hospitality stood at their gate, Peace smiled on each face, Content reigned in each heart, and Love and Health strewed roses on their pillows.

Such were the parents of Charlotte Temple, who was the only pledge of their mutual love, and who, at the earnest entreaty of a particular friend, was permitted to finish the education her mother had begun, at Madame Du Pont's school, where we first introduced her to the acquaintance of the reader.

€ HAPTER VI.

AN INTRIGUING TEACHER.

MADAME Du Pont was a woman every way calculated to take the care of young ladies, had that care entirely devolved on herfelf; but it was impossible to attend the education of a numerous school without proper affiftants: and those affiftants were not always the kind of people whose conversation and morals were exactly fuch as parents of delicacy and refinement would wish a daughter to copy. Among the teachers at Madame Du Pont's school, was Mademoiselle La Rue. who added to a pleasing person and infinu-. ating address, a liberal education and the manners of a gentlewoman. She was recommended to the school by a lady, whose humanity overstepped the bounds of difcretion: for though the knew Mifs La Rue had eloped from a convent with a young officer, and, on coming to England, had lived with feveral different men in open defiance of all moral and religious duties; yet, finding her reduced to the most abject want, and believing the penitence which fhe professed to be fincere, she took her into her own family, and from thence recommended her to Madame Du Pont, as thinking the fituation more fuitable for a woman of her abilities. But Madamoifelle poffeffed too much the fpirit of intrigue to remain long without adventures. At church, where she constantly appeared, her person attracted the attention of a young man who was upon a vifit at a gentleman's feat in the neighborhood: she had met him feveral times clandestinely; and being invited to come out that evening, and eat fome fruit and pastry in a summer-house belonging to the gentleman he was visiting, and requested to bring some of the ladies with her. Charlotte being her favorite, was fixed on to accompany her.

The mind of youth eafily catches at promifed pleafure: pure and innocent by nature, it thinks not of the dangers lurking beneath those pleafures, till too late to avoid them; when Mademoiselle asked Charlotte to go with her, she mentioned the getleman as a relation, and spoke in such high terms of the elegance of his gardens, the sprightliness of his conversation, and the liberality with which he ever entertained his guests, that Charlotte thought only of the pleasure she should enjoy in the visit,...not on the imprudence of going without her governess's knowledge, or of the danger to which she exposed herself in visiting the house of a gay young man of fashion.

Madame Du Pont had gone out for the evening; and the rest of the ladies retired to rest, when Charlotte and the teacher stole out at the back gate, and in crossing the field, were accossed by Montraville, as mentioned in the first chapter.

Charlotte was disappointed in the pleasure she had promised herself from this visit. The levity of the gentlemen and the freedom of their conversation disgusted her. She was associated them to take; grew thoughtful and uneasy, and heartly wished herself at home again in her own chamber.

Perhaps one cause of that wish might be, in earnest desire to see the contents of the letter which had been put into her hand by Montraville.

Any reader, who has the least knowledge of the world, will easily imagine the letter was made up of encomiums on her beauty, and yows of everlasting love and constancy; nor will he be surprised that a heart open to every gentle, generous sentiment, should feel itself warmed by gratitude for a man who prosessed to seel so much for her; nor is it improbable that her mind might revert to the agreeable person and martial appearance of Montraville.

In affairs of love, a young heart is never in more danger than when attacked by a handsome young soldier. A man of indifferent appearance, will, when arrayed in a military habit, show to advantage; but when beauty of person, elegance of manner, and an easy method of paying compliments, are united to the scarlet coat, smart cockade, and military sash, ah! well-a-day for the poor girl who gazes on him: she is in imminent danger; but if she listens to him with pleasure, 'tis all over with her, and from that moment she has neither eyes nor ears for any other object.

Now, my dear fober matron, (if a fober matron should deign to turn over these pages, before she trusts them to the eye of a darling daughter,) let me entreat you not to put on a grave face and throw down the book in a passion, and declare 'tis enough to turn the heads of half the girls in England; I do solemnly protest, my dear madam, I mean no more by what I have here advanced, than to ridicule those romantic girls, who soolishly imagine a red coat and a silver epaulet constitute the sine gentleman; and should that sine gentleman make half a dozen sine speeches to them, they will imagine themselves so much in love as to fancy it a meritorious action to jump out of a two pair of flairs window, abandon their friends, and truft entirely to the honor of a man, who perhaps hardly knows the meaning of the word, and, if he does, will be too much the modern man of refinement, to practice it in their favor.

Gracious heaven! when I think on the miferies that must rend the heart of a doating parent, when he sees the darling of his age at first seduced from his protection, and afterwards abandoned, by the very wretch whose promises of love decoyed her from the paternal roof....when he sees her poor and wretched, her bosom torn between remorfe for her crime and love for her vile betrayer...when sancy paints to me the good old man stooping to raise the weeping penitent, while every tear from her eye is numbered by drops from his bleeding heart, my bosom glows with honest indignation, and I wish for power to extirpate those monsters of seduction from the earth.

Oh, my dear girls....for to fuch only am I writing....liften not to the voice of love, unless fanctioned by paternal approbation: be affured, it is now past the days of romance: no woman can be run away with contrary to her own inclination: then kneel down each morning, and request kind heaven to keep you free from temptation, or, should it please to suffer you to be tried, pray for fortitude to refift the impulse of inclination when it runs counter to the precepts of religion and virtue.

42 CHARLOTTE.

GHAPTER VII.

. 27 ...

NATURAL SENSE OF PROPRIETY INHERENT IN THE FEMALE BOSOM.

"I CANNOT think we have done exactly right in going out this evening, Mademoifelle," faid Charlotte, feating herfelf when she entered her apartment: "nay, I am sure it was not right; for I expected to be very happy, but was fadly disappointed."

"It was your own fault, then," replied Mademoifelle: "for I am fure my coufin omitted nothing that could ferve to render the evening agreeable."

"True," faid Charlotte: "but I thought the gentlemen were very free in their manner: I wonder you would fuffer them to behave as they did."

"Prithee, don't be fuch a foolish little prude," faid the artful woman, affecting anger: "I invited you to go, in hopes it would divert you, and be an agreeable change of scene; however, if your delicacy was hurt by the behaviour of the gentlemen, you need not go again; so there let it rest."

"I do not intend to go again," faid Charlotte, gravely taking off her bonnet, and beginning to prepare for bed: "I am fure, if Madame Du Pont knew we had been out to night, fhe would be very angry; and it is ten to one but she hears of it by some means or other."

"Nay, Miss," faid La Rue, "perhaps your mighty sense of propriety may lead you to tell her yourself: and in order to avoid the censure you would incur, should she hear of it by accident, throw the blame on me: but I consess I deserve it: it will be a very kind return for that partiality which led me to prefer you before any of the rest of the ladies; but perhaps it will give you pleasure," continued she, letting fall some hypocritical tears, "to see me deprived of bread, and, for an action which by the most rigid could only be esteemed an inadvertency, lose my place and character, and be driven again into the world; where I have already suffered all the coils attendant on poverty."

This was touching Charlotte in the most vulnerable part; the rose from her scat, and taking Mademoiselle's hand... "you know, my dear La Rue," faid she, "I love you too welf, to do any thing that would injure you in my governess's opinion: I am only forry we went out this evening."

- "I don't believe it, Charlotte," faid she assuming a little vivacity; "for if you had not gone out, you would not have seen the gentleman who met us crossing the field; and I rather think you were pleased with his conversation."
- "I had feen him once before," replied Charlotte, "and thought him an agreeable man; and you know one is always pleafed to fee a person with whom one has passed several cheerful hours. But," said she, pausing, and drawing the letter from her pocket, while a gentle suffusion of vermillion tinged her neck and face, "he gave me this letter: what shall I do with it?"
- "Read it, to be fure," returned Made-moifelle.
- "I am afraid I ought not," faid Charlotte:
 "my mother has often told me, I should never read a letter given me by a young man, without first giving it to her."
- "Lord bless you, my dear girl," cried the teacher smiling, "have you a mind to be in leading strings all your life time? Prithee open the letter, read it, and judge for your-felf; if you show it to your mother, the confequence will be, you will be taken from school, and a strict guard kept over you: so you will stand no chance of ever seeing the smart young officer again.

- "I should not like to leave school yet," replied Charlotte, "till I have attained a greater proficiency in my Italian and music. But you can, if you please, Mademoiselle, take the letter back to Montraville, and tell him I wish him well, but cannot, with any propriety, enter into a clandestine correspondence with him." She laid the letter on the table, and began to undress herself.
- "Well," faid La Rue, "I vow you are an unaccountable girl: have you no carionty to fee the infide now? For my part I could no more let a letter addressed to me lie unsopened so long, than I could work miracles; he writes a good hand," continued she, turning the letter, to look at the superscription.
- "'Tis well enough," faid Charlotte, drawing it towards her.
- Rue, carelessly folding up her apron at the fame time; "but I think he is marked with the fmall pox."
- "O you are greatly mistaken," said Charlotte, eagerly; "he has a remarkable clear skin and fine complexion."
- faw, 'a faid La Rue, " are grey, and want expression."

"By no means," replied Charlotte; "they are the most expressive eyes I ever saw."

"Well, child, whether they are grey or black is of no confequence; you have determined not to read his letter; fo it is likely you will never either fee or hear from him again."

Charlotte took up the letter and Mademoifelle continued.....

"He is most probably going to America; and if ever you should hear any account of him, it may possibly be, that he is killed; and though he loved you ever so fervently, though his last breath should be spent in a prayer for your happiness, it can be nothing to you; you can feel nothing for the sate of the man, whose letters you will not open, and whose sufferings you will not alleviate, by permitting him to think you, would remember him when absent, and pray for his safety."

Charlotte fill held the letter in her hand; her heart welled at the conclusion of Mademoitelle's speech, and a tear dropped upon the wafer that closed it.

"The wafer is not dry yet," faid she, "and sure there can be no great harm....."
She hesitated. La Rue was silent. "I may read, it Mademoiselle, and return it afterwards."

"Certainly," replied Mademoiselle.

"At any rate I am determined not to anfwer it," continued Charlotte, as she opened the letter.

Here let me ftop to make one remark, and trust me my very heart aches while I write it; but certain I am, that when once a woman has stifled the sense of shame in her own bosom, when once she has lost sight of the basis on which reputation, honor, every thing that should be dear to the semale heart, rests, she grows hardened in guilt, and will spare no pains to bring down innocence and beauty to the shocking level with herself: and this proceeds from that diabolical spirit of envy, which repines at seeing another in the sull possession of that respect and esteem which she can no longer hope to enjoy.

Mademoifelle eyed the unfufpecting Charlotte, as the perufed the letter, with a malignant pleafure. She faw that the contents had awakened new emotions in her youthful bosom: the encouraged her hopes, calmed her fears, and before they parted for the night, it was determined that the should meet Montraville in the ensuing evening.

CHAPTER VIII.

DOMESTIC PLEASURE PLANNED.

"I THINK, my dear," faid Mrs. Temple, laying her hand on her husband's arm, as they were walking together in the garden, "I think next Wednesday is Charlotte's birth day: now I have formed a little scheme in my own mind, to give her an agreeable furprise; and if you have no objection, we will fend for her home on that day." Temple pressed his wife's hand, in token of approbation, and she proceeded-"You know the little alcove at the bottom of the garden, of which Charlotte is fo fond? I have an inclination to deck this out in a fanciful manner, and invite all her little friends to partake of a collation of fruit, sweatmeats, and other things fuitable to the general tafte of young guests; and to make it more pleasing to Charlotte, the shall be mistress of the feast, and entertain her vifitors in this alcove. know fhe will be delighted; and, to complete all, they shall have fome music, and finish with a dance."

- "A very fine plan indeed," faid Temple, fmiling; "and you really suppose I will wink at your indulging the girl in this manner? You will quite spoil her, Lucy, indeed you will."
- "She is the only child we have," faid Mrs. Temple, the whole tenderness of a mother adding animation to her fine countenance; but it was withal tempered so sweetly with the meek affection and kind compliance of the wife, that, as she paused, expecting her husband's answer, he gazed at her tenderly, and found he was unable to resuse her request.
 - " She is a good girl," faid Temple.
- "She is, indeed," replied the fond mother exultingly, "a grateful, affectionate girl; and I am fure will never lofe fight of the duty she owes her parents."
- "If she does," said he, "she must forget the example set her by the best of mothers."

Mrs. Temple could not reply; but the delightful fensation that dilated her heart, sparkled in her intelligent eyes, and heightened the vermillion on her cheeks.

Of all the pleasures of which the human mind is fensible, there is none equal to that which warms and expands the bosom, when we are liftening to commendations bestowed upon us by a beloved object, and are conscious of having deserved them.

Ye giddy flutterers in the fantaflic round of diffipation, who eagerly feek pleafure in the lofty dome, rich treat, and midnight revel-tell me, thoughtless daughters of folly, have you ever found the phantom you have fo long fought with fuch unremitted affiduity? Has fhe not always eluded your grafp, and, when you have reached your hand to take the cup she extends to her deluded votaries, have you not found the long expected draught strongly tinctured with the bitter dregs of disappointment? I know you have: I fee it in the wan cheek, funk eye, and air of chagrin, which ever mark the children of diffipation. Pleafure is a vain illusion; she draws you on to a thousand follies, errors, and I may fay vices, and then leaves you to deplore your thoughtless credulity.

Look, my dear friends, at yonder lovely Virgin, arrayed in a white robe, devoid of ornament; behold the meekness of her countenance, the modesty of her gait; her band, maids are Humility, Filial Piety, Conjugal Affection, Industry and Benevolence; her name is Content; fhe holds in her hand the cup of true felicity, and when once you have formed an intimate acquaintance with these her attendants, nay, you must admit them as your bosom friends and chief counsellors, then, whatever may be your fituation in life, the meek eyed Virgin will immediately take up her abode with you.

Is poverty your portion?—fine will lightten your labors, prefide at your frugal board, and watch your quiet flumbers.

Is your flate mediocrity?—fhe will heighten every bleffing you enjoy, by informing you how grateful you fhould be to that bountiful Providence who might have placed you in the most abject fituation; and, by teaching you to weigh your bleffings against your deferts, show you how much more you receive, than you have a right to expect.

Are you possessed of affluence?—what an inexhaustible fund of happiness will she lay before you! To relieve the distressed, redress the injured, in short, to perform all the good works of peace and mercy.

Content, my dear friends, will blunt even the arrows of adverfity, fo that they cannot materially harm you. She will dwell in the humblest cottage: she will attend you even to a prison. Her parent is religion; her fifters, Patience and Hope. She will pass with you through life, smoothing the rough paths, and treading to earth those thorns which every one must meet with as they journey onward to the appointed goal. She will soften the pains of sickness, continue with you even in the cold gloomy hour of death, and, cheering you with the smiles of her heaven-born sister, Hope, lead you triaumphantly to a blissful eternity.

I confess I have rambled strangely from my story: but what of that? if I have been for lucky as to find the road to happiness, why should I be such a niggard as to omit so good an opportunity of pointing out the way to others! the very basis of true peace of mind is a benevolent with to fee all the world as happy as one's felf; and from my foul do I pity the felfish churl, who, remembering the little bickerings of anger, envy, and fifty other difagreeables to which frail mortality is subject, would wish to avenge the affront which pride whifpers him he has received. For my own part, I can fafely declare, there is not a human being in the universe, whose prosperity I should not rejoice in, and to whose happiness I would not contribute to the utmost limit of my power: and may my offences be no more remembered in the day of general retribution, than as from my foul I forgive every offence or injury received from a fellow creature.

54 CHARLOTTE.

Merciful heaven! who would exchange the rapture of fuch a reflection for all the gaudy tinfel which the world calls pleafure.

But to return.—Content dwelt in Mrs. Temple's bosom, and spread a charming animation over her countenance, as her husband led her in, to lay the plan she had forms ed (for the celebration of Charlotte's birthday,) before Mr. Eldridge.

GHAPTER IX.

WE KNOW NOT WHAT A DAY MAY BRING FORTH.

Various were the fensations which agitated the mind of Charlotte, during the day preceding the evening in which she was to meet Montraville. Several times did she almost resolve to go to her governess, show her his letter, and be guided by her advice: but Charlotte had taken one step in the ways of imprudence; and when that is once done, there are always innumerable obstacles to prevent the erring person returning to the path of rectitude: yet these obstacles, however forcible they may appear in general, exist chiefly in the imagination.

Charlotte feared the anger of her governess: she loved her mother, and the very idea of incurring her displeasure, gave her the greatest uneasiness; but there was a more forcible reason still remaining: should she show the letter to Madame du Pont, she must confess the means by which it came into her possession; and what would be the confequence? Mademoiselle would be turned out of doors.

"I must not be ungrateful," said she, "La Rue is very kind to me; besides I can, when I see Montraville, inform him of the impropriety of our continuing to see or correspond with each other, and request him to come no more to Chichester."

However prudent Charlotte might be in these resolutions, she certainly did not take a proper method to confirm herself in them. Several times, in the course of the day, she indulged herself in reading over the letter, and each time she read it, the contents sunk deeper in her heart. As evening drew near, she caught herself frequently consulting her watch. "I wish this foolish meeting was over," said she, by way of apology to her own heart, "I wish it was over; for when I have seen him, and convinced him that my resolution is not to be shaken, I shall feel my mind much easier."

The appointed hour arrived. Charlotte and Mademoifelle cluded the eye of vigilance; and Montraville who had waited their coming with impatience, received them with rapturous and unbounded acknowledgments for their condescention: he had wisely brought Belcour with him, to entertain Mademoifelle, while he enjoyed an uninterrupted conversation with Charlotte.

Belcour was a man whose character might be comprifed in a few words; and as he will make fome figure in the enfuing pages, I shall here describe him. He possessed a genteel fortune, and had had a liberal education; diffipated, thoughtlefs, and capricious, he paid little regard to the moral duties, and less to religious ones: eager in the purfuit of pleasure, he minded not the miseries he inflicted on others, provided his own wifhes, however extravagant, were gratified. Self, darling felf was the idol he worshiped, and to that he would have facrificed the interest and happiness of all mankind. Such was the friend of Montraville: will not the reader be ready to imagine, that the man who could regard fuch a character, must be actuated by the same seelings, follow the fame purfuits, and be equally unworthy with the person to whom he thus gave his confidence?

But Montraville was a different character: generous in his disposition, liberal in his opinions, and good natured almost to a fault; yet eager and impetuous in the pursuit of a favorite object, he staid not to reslect on the consequence which might follow the attainment of his wishes; with a mind ever open to conviction, had he been so fortunate as to possess a friend who would have pointed out the cruelty of endeavoring to gain the heart of an innocent artless girl, when he knew it was utterly impossible for him to marry her, and when the gratification of his passion would be unavoidable infamy and mifery to her, and a cause of never-ceasing remorfe to himself: had these dreadful consequences been placed before him in a proper light, the humanity of his nature would have urged him to give up the pursuit : but Belcour was not this friend; he rather encouraged the growing paffion of Montraville; and being pleafed with the vivacity of Mademoiselle, resolved to leave no argument untried, which he thought might prevail on her to be the companion of their intended voyage: and he made no doubt but her example, added to the rhetoric of Montraville, would perfuade Charlotte to go with them.

Charlotte had, when fhe went out to meet Montraville, flattered herfelf, that her refolution was not to be flaken, and that, confcious of the impropriety of her conduct in having a clandestine intercourse with a stranger, she would never repeat the indiscretion.

But alas poor Charlotte! she knew not the deceitfulness of her own heart, or she would have avoided the trial of her stability.

Montraville was tender, eloquent, ardent, and yet respectful. "Shall I not see you once more," faid he, "before I leave England? will you not bless me by an affurance, that when we are divided by a vast expanse of sea, I shall not be forgotten?"

Charlotte fighed.

- "Why that figh, my dear Charlotte? could I flatter myfelf that a fear for my fafety, or a wifh for my welfare occasioned it, how happy would it make me."
- "I shall ever wish you well, Montraville," faid she; "but we must meet no more."
- "Oh fay not fo, my lovely girl: reflect, that when I leave my native land, perhaps a few short weeks may terminate my existence; the perils of the ocean...the dangers of war..."
- "I can hear no more," faid Charlotte in a tremulous voice, "I must leave you."
 - "Say you will fee me once again."
 - " I dare not," faid she.
- "Only for one half hour to-morrow evening: 'tis my last request. I shall never trouble you again, Charlotte."

- "I know not what to fay," cried Charlotte, struggling to draw her hands from him: "let me leave you now."
- "And you will come to-morrow," faid Montraville.
 - " Perhaps I may," faid fhe.
- " Adieu, then, I will live upon that hope, till we meet again."

He kiffed her hand. She fighed an adieu, and catching hold of Mademoifelle's arm, haftily entered the garden gate.

GHAPTER X.

WHEN WE HAVE EXCITED CURIOSITY, IT IS BUT AN ACT OF GOOD NATURE TO GRATIFY IT.

MONTRAVILLE was the youngest son of a gentleman of fortune, whose family being numerous, he was obliged to bring up his sons to genteel professions, by the exercise of which they might hope to raise themselves into notice.

"My daughters," faid he, "have been educated like gentlewomen; and should I die before they are settled, they must have some provision made, to place them above the snares and temptations which vice ever holds out to the elegant, accomplished semale, when oppressed by the frowns of poverty and the sting of dependance: my boys, with only moderate incomes, when placed in the church, at the bar, or in the field, may exert their talents, make themselves friends, and raise their fortunes on the basis of merit."

When Montraville chofe the profession of arms, his father prefented him with a commission, and made him a handsome provifion for his private purfe. "Now, my boy," faid he, "go! feek glory in the field of battle. You have received from me all I shall ever have it in my power to bestow: it is certain I have interest to gain you promotion; but be assured that that interest shall never be exerted, unless by your future conduct you deferve it. Remember therefore your fuccess in life depends entirely on yourfelf. There is one thing I think it my duty to caution you against; the precipitancy with which young men frequently rush into matrimonial engagements, and by their thoughtlessness draw many a deferving woman into fcenes of poverty and diffrefs. A foldier has no bufiness to think of a wife, till his rank is such as to place him above the fear of bringing into the world a train of helpless innocents, heirs only to penury and affliction. If, indeed, a woman, whose fortune is sufficient to preferve you in that state of independence, which I would teach you to prize, should generously bestow herfelf on a young foldier, whose chief hope of future prosperity depended on his fuccess in the field-if fuch a woman should offer-every barrier is removed, and I should rejoice in an union which would promife fo much felicity. But mark me, boy, if, on the contrary, you ruft into a precipitate union with a girl of little or no fortune, take the poor creature from a comfortable home, and kind friends, and plunge her into all the evils that a narrow income and encreasing family can inslict, I will leave you to enjoy the bleffed fruits of your rafhness; for by all that is facred, neither my interest or fortune shall ever be exerted in your favor. I am ferious," continued he; "therefore imprint this conversation on your memory, and let it influence your future conduct. Your happiness will always be dear to me; and I wish to warn you of a rock on which the peace of many an honest fellow has been wrecked; for believe me, the difficulties and dangers of the longest winter campaign are much easier to be borne than the pangs that would feize your heart, when you beheld the woman of your choice, the children of your affection, involved in penury and diftrefs, and reflected that it was your own folly and precipitancy had been the prime cause of their fuffering."

As this conversation passed but a few hours before Montraville took leave of his father, it was deeply impressed on his mind: when, therefore, Belcour came with him to the place of assignation with Charlotte, he directed him to enquire of the French woman what were Miss Temple's expectations in regard to fortune.

Mademoiselle informed him, that though Charlotte's father possessed a genteel independence, it was by no means probable that he could give his daughter more than a thousand pounds; and in case she did not marry to his liking, it was possible he might not give her a single sous; nor did it appear the least likely, that Mr. Temple would agree to her union with a young man on the point of embarking for the seat of war.

Montraville therefore concluded it was impossible he should ever marry Charlotte Temple; and what end he proposed to himfelf by continuing the acquaintance he had commenced with her, he did not at that moment give himself time to enquire.

CHAPTER XI.

CONFLICT OF LOVE AND DUTY.

Almost a week was now gone, and Charlotte continued every evening to meet Montraville, and in her heart every meeting was refolved to be the last; but alas! when Montraville at parting, would earnestly entreat one more interview, that treacherous heart betrayed her; and forgetful of its resolution, pleaded the cause of the enemy so powerfully, that Charlotte was unable to resist. Another and another meeting succeeded; and so well did Montraville improve each opportunity, that the heedless girl at length confessed no idea could be so painful to her as that of never seeing him again.

"Then we will never be parted," faid he.

"Ah, Montraville," replied Charlotte, forcing a fmile, "how can it be avoided? My parents would never confent to our union; and even could they be brought to approve of it, how should I bear to be separated from my kind, my beloved mother?"

"Then you love your parents more than you do me, Charlotte?"

"I hope I do," faid fhe, blufhing and looking down, "I hope my affection for them will ever keep me from infringing the laws of filial duty."

"Well, Charlotte," faid Montraville gravely, and letting go her hand, "fince that is the cafe, I find I have deceived myfelf with fallacious hopes. I had flattered my fond heart, that I was dearer to Charlotte than any thing in the world befide. I thought that you would for my fake have braved the dangers of the ocean, that you would, by your affection and fmiles, have foftened the hardfhips of war, and, had it been my fate to fall, that your tenderness would chear the hour of death, and smooth my passage to another world. But farewell, Charlotte! I see you never loved me. I shall now welcome the friendly ball that deprives me of the sense of my misery."

"Oh stay, unkind Montravillle," cried she, catching hold of his arm, as he pretended to leave her, "stay, and to calm your fears, I will here protest, that was it not for the fear of giving pain to the best of parents, and returning their kindness with ingratitude, I would follow you through every danger, and, in studying to promote your happiness, insure my own. But I cannot break my mother's heart, Montraville; I must not bring the grey hairs of my doating grand-sather with forrow to the grave, or make my beloved sather perhaps curse the hour that gave me birth." She covered her sace with her hands, and burst into tears.

"All these distressing scenes, my dear Charlotte," cried Montraville, "are merely the chimeras of a disturbed sancy. Your parents might perhaps grieve at sirst; but when they heard from your own hand, that you was with a man of honor, and that it was to ensure your felicity by an union with him, to which you feared they would never have given their affent, that you left their protection, they will, be affured, forgive an error which love alone occasioned, and when we return from America, receive you with open arms and tears of joy,"

Belcour and Mademoifelle heard this last fpeech, and conceiving it a proper time to throw in their advice and perfuaiions, approached Charlotte, and fo well feconded the intreaties of Montraville, that finding Mademoifelle intended going with Belcour, and feeling her own treacherous heart too much inclined to accompany them, the haplefs Charlotte, confented in an evil hour that the next evening they should bring a chaife to the end of the town, and that the would leave her friends, and throw herfelf entirely on the protection of Montraville. "But should vou," faid fhe, looking earnestly at him, her eyes full of tears, "fhould you, forgetful of your promifes, and repenting the engagements you here voluntarily enter into, forfake and leave me on a foreign fhore. -"

[&]quot;Judge not fo meanly of me," faid he. "The moment we reach our place of deftination, Hymen shall fanctify our love: and when I shall forget your goodness, may hear ten forget me."

- "Ah," faid Charlotte, leaving on Mademoifelle's arm, as they walked up the garden together, "I have forgot all that I ought to have remembered, in confenting to this intended elopement."
- "You are a strange girl," said Mademoifelle: "you never know your own mind two minutes at a time. Just now you declared Montraville's happiness was whatyou prized most in the world; and now I suppose you repent having insured that happiness by agreeing to accompany him abroad."
- "Indeed I do repent," replied Charlotte, "from my foul: but while diferetion points out the impropriety of my conduct, inclination urges me on to ruin."
- "Ruin! fiddleftick!" faid Mademoifelle; am not I going with you? and do I feel any of these qualms?"
- "You do not renounce a tender father and mother," faid Charlotte.
- "But I hazard my dear reputation," replied Mademoifelle, bridling.
- "True," replied Charlotte, "but you do not feel what I do." She then bade her good night; but fleep was a stranger to her eyes, and the tear of anguish watered her pillow.

CHAPTER XII.

C -215 43

Nature's last, best gift:
Greature in whom excell'd, whatever could
To fight or thought be nam'd!
Holy, divine! good, amiable, and sweet,
How art thou fall'n!

When Charlotte left her reftlefs bed, her languid eye, and pale cheek, discovered to Madame Du Pont the little repose she had tasted.

- "My dear child," faid the affectionate governess, "what is the cause of the languor so apparent in your frame? Are you not well?"
- "Yes, my dear Madam, very well," replied Charlotte, attempting to fmile, "but I know not how it was; I could not fleep last night, and my spirits are depressed this morning."
- "Come, cheer up, my love," faid the governess; "I believe I have brought a cordial to revive them. I have just received a letter from your good mama, and here is one for yourfelf."

Charlotte hastily took the letter: it contained these words:—

" As to-morrow is the anniversary of the happy day that gave my beloved girl to the anxious wifnes of a maternal heart, I have requeited your governess to let you come home and spend it with us; and as I know you to be a good affectionate child, and make it your fludy to improve in those branches of education, which you know will give most pleasure to your delighted parents, as a reward for your diligence and attention, I have prepared an agreeable furprize for your reception. Your grand-father, eager to embrace the darling of his aged heart, will come in the chaife for you: fo hold yourfelf in readinefs to attend him by nine o'clock. Your dear father joins in every tender wish for your health and future felicity, which warms the heart of my dear Charlotte's affectionate mother,

L. TEMPLE.

"Gracious heaven!" cried Charlotte, forgetting where the was, and raifing her ftreaming eyes as in earnest supplication.

Madame Du Pont was furprised. "Why these tears, my love?" said she. "Why this seeming agitation? I thought the letter would have rejoiced, instead of distressing you."

"It does rejoice me," replied Chatlotte, endeavoring at composure, "but I was praying for merit to deserve the unremitted attentions of the best of parents."

"You do right," faid Madame Du Pont, "to ask the affistance of heaven that you may continue to deserve their love. Continue, my dear Charlotte, in the course you have ever pursued, and you will ensure at once their happiness and your own."

"Oh!" cried Charlotte, as her governess left her, "I have forfeited both for ever! Yet let me reflect:—the irrevocable step is not yet taken: it is not too late to recede from the brink of a precipice, from which I can only behold the dark abyssof ruin, shame and remorse!"

She arose from her seat, and slew to the apartment of La Rue. "Oh Mademoiselle!" said she, "I am snatched by a miracle from destruction! This letter has saved me: it has opened my eyes to the folly I was so near committing. I will not go, Mademoiselle; I will not wound the hearts of those dear parents who make my happiness the whole study of their lives.".

"Well," faid Mademoiselle, "do as you please, Mis; but pray understand that my resolution is taken, and it is not in your power to alter it. I shall meet the gentlemen at the appointed hour, and shall not be furprized at any outrage which Montraville may commit, when he finds himfelf difappointed. Indeed I should not be aftonished, was he to come immediately here, and reproach you for your instability in the hearing of the whole school: and what will be the confequence? you will bear the odium of having formed the refolution of eloping, and every girl of spirit will laugh at your want of fortitude to put it in execution, while prudes and fools will load you with reproach and contempt. You will have loft the confidence of your parents, incurred their anger, and the fcoffs of the world; and what fruit do you expect to reap from this piece of heroifm, (for fuch no doubt you think it is?) you will have the pleasure to reflect, that you have deceived the man who adores you, and whom in your heart you prefer to all other men, and that you are feparated from him for ever."

This eloquent harangue was given with fuch volubility, that Charlotte could not find an opportunity to interrupt her, or to offer a fingle word till the whole was finished, and then found her ideas so confused, that she knew not what to say.

At length fhe determined that fhe would go with Mademoifelle to the place of affignation, convince Montraville of the necessity of adhering to the resolution of remaining behind; assure him of her affection, and bid him adieu.

Charlotte formed this plan in her mind, and exulted in the certainty of its success. "How shall I rejoice," said she, "in this triumph of reason over inclination, and, when in the arms of my affectionate parents, lift up my soul in gratitude to heaven as I look back on the dangers I have escaped!"

The hour of affignation arrived: Mademoifelle put what money and valuables the possession in her pocket, and advised Charlotte to do the same; but she refused; "my refolution is fixed," said she; "I will sacrifice love to duty."

Mademoifelle smiled internally; and they proceeded softly down the back stairs and out of the garden gate. Montraville and Belcour were ready to receive them.

"Now," faid Montraville, taking Charlotte in his arms, "you are mine forever."

"No," faid fhe, withdrawing from his embrace, "I am come to take an everlasting farewell."

It would be useless to repeat the converfation that here ensued; suffice it to say, that Montraville used every argument that had formerly been fuccefsful, Charlotte's resolution began to waver, and he drew her almost imperceptibly towards the chaise.

- "I cannot go," faid fhe: "cease, dear Montraville, to persuade. I must not: religion, duty, forbid."
- "Cruel Charlotte," faid he, "if you difappoint my ardent hopes, by all that is faored, this hand shall put a period to my existence. I cannot—will not live without you."
- Alas! my torn heart!" faid Charlotte, how shall I act?"
- "Let me direct you," faid Montraville, lifting her into the chaife.
- "Oh! my dear forfaken parents!" cried

The chaife drove off. She shrieked, and fainted into the arms of her betrayer.

GHAPTER XIII.

mcr. Sie : lom

CRUEL DISAPPOINTMENT.

What pleafure," cried Mr. Eldridge, as he flepped into the chaife to go for his: grand-daughter, "what pleafure expands the heart of an old man when he beholds the progeny of a beloved child growing up in every virtue that adorned the minds of herparents. I foolifhly thought, fome few years fince, that every fenfe of joy was buried in the grave of my dear partner and my fon; but my Lucy, by her filial affection, foothed my foul to peace, and this dear Charlotte has twined herfelf round my heart, and opened fuch new feenes of delight to my view, that Ialmost forget that I have ever been unhappy."

When the chaife ftopped, he alighted with the alacrity of youth; fo much do the emotions of the foul influence the body.

It was half past eight o'clock: the ladies were assembled in the school room, and Madame Du Pont was preparing to offer the morning facrifice of prayer and graife, when it was discovered, that Mademoiselle and Charlotte were missing.

"She is bufy, no doubt," faid the governess, "in preparing Charlotte for her little excursion; but pleasure shall never make us forget our duty to our Creator. Go, one of you, and bid them both attend prayers."

The lady who went to fummon them, foor returned, and informed the governess, that the room was locked, and that she had knocked repeatedly, but obtained no answer.

"Good heaven!" cried Madame du Pont, "this is very strange;" and turning pale with terror, she went hastily to the door and ordered it to be forced open. The apartment instantly discovered, that no person had been in it the preceding night, the beds appearing as though just made. The house was instantly a scene of confusion: the garden, the pleasure grounds were searched to no purpose; every apartment rung with the names of Miss Temple and Mademoiselle; but they were too distant to hear; and every sace wore the marks of disappointment.

Mr. Eldridge was fitting in the parlour, eagerly expecting his grand daughter to defeend, ready equipped for her journey: he heard the confusion that reigned in the house; he heard the name of Charlotte frequently repeated. "What can be the matter?" faids he, rifing and opening the door: "I fear fome accident has befallen my dear girl."

The governess entered. The visible agitation of her countenance discovered that something extraordinary had happened.

- "Where is Charlotte?" faid he, "Whysdoes not my child come to welcome her doating parent?"
- "Be composed, my dear Sir," faid Madame Du Pont, do not frighten yourself unnecessarily. She is not in the house at present; but as Mademoiselle is undoubtedly with her, she will speedily return in safety; and I hope they will both be able to account for this unseasonable absence in such a manner as shall remove our present uneasiness."
- "Madam," cried the old man, with an angry look, "has my child been accustomed to go out without leave, with no other company or protector than that French woman? Pardon me, Madam, I mean no reflections on your country, but I never did like Mademoiselle La Rue; I think she was a very improper person to be entrusted with the care of such a girl as Charlotte Temple, or to be sufficient to take her from under your immediate protection."

"You wrong me, Mr. Eldridge," faid fhe,, "if you suppose I have ever permitted your grand-daughter to go out, unless with theother ladies. I would to heaven I could form any probable conjecture concerning her absence this morning; but it is a myslery to me which her return can alone unravel."

Servants were now dispatched to every place where there was the least hope of hearing any tidings of the fugitives, but in vain. Dreadful were the hours of horrid suspense which Mr. Eldridge passed till twelve o'clock, when that suspense was reduced to a shocking certainty, and every spark of hope, which till then they had indulged, was in a moment extinguished.

Mr. Eldridge was preparing, with a heary heart, to return to his anxiously expecting children, when Madame Du Pont received the following note without either name or date.

"Miss Temple is well, and wishes to relieve the anxiety of her parents, by lettingthem know she has voluntarily put herself under the protection of a man whose suture study shall be to make her happy. Pursuit is needless; the measures taken to avoid discovery are too effectual to be eluded. When she thinks her friends are reconciled to this precipitate step, they may perhaps be informed of her place of residence. Mademoi-felle is with her."

As Madame Du Pont read these cruellines, she turned pale as ashes, her limbse trembled, and she was forced to call for aglass of water. She loved Charlotte truly : and when she resected on the innocence and gentleness of her disposition, she concluded that it must have been the advice and machinations of La Rue, which led her to this imprudent action; she recollected her agitation at the receipt of her mother's letter, and saw in it the consist of her mind.

- "Does that letter relate to Charlotte?" faid Mr. Eldridge, having waited fome time in expectation of Madame Du Pont's fpeaking.
- "It does," faid fine. "Cearlotte is well, but cannot return to day."
- "Not return, Madam? where is fhe?" who will detain her from her fond expecting parents?"
- "You distract me with these questions, Mr. Eldridge. Indeed I know not where the is, or who has seduced her from her duty."

The whole truth now rushed at once upon Mr. Eldridge's mind. "She has eloped, then," faid he, "my child is betrayed; the darling, the comfort of my aged heart, is lost? Oh would to heaven I had died but yesterday."

A violent gush of grief in some measurerelieved him, and, after several vain attempts, he at length assumed sufficient composure toread the note.

"And how shall I return to my children?" faid he; "how approach that mansion, so late the habitation of peace? Alas! my dear Lucy, how will you support these heart-rending tidings? or how shall I be enabled to console you, who need so much consolation myself?"

The old man returned to the chaife, but the light step and cheerful countenance were no more; forrow filled his heart, and guided his motions; he feated himself in the chaife, his venerable head reclined upon his bosom, his hands were folded, his eye fixed on vacancy, and the large drops of forrow rolled filently down his cheeks. There was a mixture of anguish and resignation depicted in his countenance, as if he would say, henceforth who shall dare to boast his happiness, or even in idea contemplate his treasure, lest in the very moment his heart is exulting in its own felicity, the object which constitutes that selicity should be torn from him he

CHAPTER XIV.

MATERNAL SORROW.

Srow and heavy passed the time while the carriage was conveying Mr. Eldridge home; and yet when he came in sight of the house, he wished a longer reprieve from the dreadful task of informing Mr. and Mrs. Temple: of their daughter's elopement.

It is easy to judge the anxiety of these affectionate parents, when they found the return of their father delayed fo much beyond. the expected time. They were now met in: the dining parlour, and feveral of the youngpeople who had been invited were already arrived. Each different part of the company was employed in the fame manner, looking out at the windows which faced the road. At length the long expected chaife appeared. Mrs. Temple ran out to receive and welcome her darling....her young companions flocked round the door, each one eager to give her joy on the return of her birth day. The door of the chaife was opened: Charlotte was not there. "Where is my child?" eried Mrs. Temple, in breathless agitation.

Mr. Eldridge could not answer: he took hold of his daughter's hand and led her into the house; and finking on the first chair he came to, burst into tears, and sobbed aloud.

"She is dead," cried Mrs. Temple. "Ohmy dear Charlotte!" and clasping her handsin an agony of distress, fell into strong hysterics.

Mr. Temple who had ftood speechless with furprize and fear, now ventured to enquire if indeed his Charlotte was no more. Mr. Eldridge led him into another apartment and putting the fatal note into his hand, cried "Bear it like a Christian:" and turned from him, endeavoring to suppress his own too wisble emotions.

It would be vain to attempt describing what Mr. Temple selt whilst he hastily rand over the dreadful lines: when he had sinished, the paper dropt from his unnerved hand. "Gracious heaven!" said he, "could Charlotte act thus?" Neither tear nor sigh escaped him; and he set the image of mute forrow, till roused from his stupor by the repeated shricks of Mrs. Temple. He rose hastily, and rushing into the apartment where she was, soided his arms about her and saying—"Let us be patient, my dear Lucy," nature relieved his almost bursting heart by a friendly gush of tears.

Should any one, prefuming on his own philosophic temper, look with an eye of contempt on the man who could indulge a woman's weakness, let him remember that man was a father, and he will then pity the misery which wrung those drops from a noble, generous heart.

Mrs. Temple beginning to be a little more composed, but still imagining her child was dead, her husband, gently taking her hand, cried..." You are mistaken, my love. Charlotte is not dead."

"Then she is very iil; else why did she not come? But I will go to her: the chaise is still at the door: let me go instantly to the dear girl. If I was ill, she would sty to attend me, to alleviate my sufferings, and chear me with her love."

"Be calm, my dearest Lucy, and I will tell you all," said Mr. Temple. "You must not go, indeed you must not: it will be of no use."

"Temple," faid she, assuming a look of stranges and composure, "tell me the truth I befeech you. I cannot bear this dreadful suspense. What misfortune has befallen my child? let me know the worst, and I will endeavor to bear it as I ought."

- "Lucy," replied Mr. Temple, "imagine your daughter alive, and in no danger of death: what misfortune would you then dread?"
- "There is one misfortune which is worfe than death. But I know my child too well to suspect—"
 - " Be not too confident, Lucy."
- "Oh heavens!" faid fhe, "what horrid images do you flart: is it possible she should forget.—"
- "She has forgot as all, my love; fhe has preferred the love of a stranger to the affectionate protection of her friends."
 - " Not eleped?" cried she eagerly.

Mr. Temple was filent.

"You cannot contradict it," faid she. "I fee my fate in those tearful eyes. Oh Charlotte! Charlotte! how ill have you requitted our tenderness! But, Father of mercies," continued she, sinking on her knees, and raising her streaming eyes and clasped hands to heaven, "this once vouchfase to hear a fond, a distracted mother's prayer. Oh let thy bounteous Providence watch over and protect the dear thoughtless girl, save her from the miseries which I fear will be her portion, and oh! of thine infinite mercy, make her not a mother, lest she should ore day feel what I now suffer."

The last words faultered on her tongue, and she fell fainting into the arms of her husband, who had involuntarily dropped on his knees beside her.

A mother's anguish when disappointed in her tenderest hopes, none but a mother can conceive. Yet, my dear young readers, I would have you to read this fcene with attention, and reflect that you may yourfelves one day be mothers. Oh, my friends, as you value your eternal happiness, wound not, by thoughtless ingratitude, the peace of the mother who bore you: remember the tenderness; the care, the unremitting anxiety with which fhe has attended to all your wants and wishes from earliest infancy to the present day; behold the mild ray of affectionate applause that beams from her eye on the performance of your duty: listen to her reproofs with silent attention; they proceed from a heart anxious for your future felicity: you must love her; nature, all-powerful nature has planted the feeds of filial affection in your bosoms.

Then once more read over the forrows of poor Mrs. Temple, and remember, the mother whom you fo dearly love and venerate year. 1.

will feel the same, should you, forgetful of the respect due to your maker and yourself, forsake the paths of virtue for those of vice and solly.

OHAPTER XY.

EMBARKATION.

It was with the utmost difficulty that the united efforts of Mademoiselle and Montraville could support Charlotte's spirits during their short ride from Chichester to Portsmouth, where a boat waited to take them immediately on board the ship in which they were to embark for America.

As foon as five became tolerably composed she entreated pen and ink to write to her parents. This she did in the most affecting, artless manner, entreating their pardon and blessing, and describing the dreadful fituation of her mind, the consist she suffered in endeavoring to conquer this unfortunate attachment, and concluded with saying, her only hope of suture comfort consisted in the (perhaps delusive) idea she indulged, of being once more folded in their protecting arms, and hearing the words of peace and pardon from their lips.

The tears fireamed inceffantly while the was writing, and the was frequently obliged to lay down her pen; but when the talk was completed, and the had committed the letter to the care of Montraville, to be fent to the post-office, the became more calm, and indulging the delightful hope of soon receiving an answer that would feal her pardon, the in some measure assumed herusual chearfulness.

But Montraville knew too well the confequences that must unavoidably ensue, should this letter reach Mr. Temple: he therefore crastily resolved to walk on the deck, tear it in pieces, and commit the fragments to thecare of Neptune, who might or might not, as it suited his convenience, convey them on thore.

All Charlotte's hopes and wishes were now centered in one, namely, that the fleet might be detained at Spithead till she could receive a letter from her friends; but in this she was disappointed; for the second morning after she went on board, the signal was made, the fleet weighed anchor, and in a sew hours (the wind being savorable) they bid adieu to the white cliss of Albion.

In the mean time every enquiry that could be thought of was made by Mr. and Mrs. Temple: for many days did they indulge the fond hope that she was merely gone off to be married, and that when the indiffoluble knot was once tied, she would return with the partner she had chosen, and entreat their blessing and forgiveness.

"And finall we not forgive her?" faich Mr. Temple,

"Forgive her!" exclaimed the mother." Oh yes, whatever be her errors, is she not our child? and though bowed even to to the earth with shame and remorfe, is it not our duty to raise the poor penitent, and whisper peace and comfort to her desponding soul? would she but return, with rapture would I sold her to my heart, and bury every remembrance of her faults in the dear embrace."

But still day after day passed on, and Charlotte did not appear, nor were any tidings to be heard of her: yet each rising morning was welcomed by some new hope...the evening brought with it disappointment. At length hope was no more; despair usurped her place; and the mansion which was once the mansion of peace, became the habitation of pale dejected melancholy.

The chearful fmile that was wont to adorn the face of Mrs. Temple, was fled, and had it not been for the support of unaffected piety, and a confeiousness of having ever fet before her child the fairest example, she must have funk under this heavy assistion.

"Since," faid she, "the feverest ferutiny cannot charge me with any breach of duty, to have deferved this fevere chaftifement, I will bow before the power who inflicts it with humble refignation to his will; nor shall the duty of a wife be totally abforbed in the feelings of the mother; I will endeavor to feem more chearful, and by appearing in fome measure to have conquered my own forrow, alleviate the fufferings of my hufband, and rouse him from that torpor into which this misfortune has plunged him. My father too demands my care and attention: I must not, by a felfish indulgence of my own grief, forget the interest those two dear objects take in my happiness or misery: I will wear a fmile on my face, though the thorn rankles in my heart: and if by fo doing I contribute in the fmallest degree to restore their peace of mind, I shall be amply rewarded for the pain the concealment of my own feelings may occasion."

Thus argued this excellent woman: and in the execution of fo laudable a refolution we shall leave her, to follow the fortunes of the hapless victim of imprudence and cvil counsellors.

CHAPTER XVI.

NECESSARY DIGRESSION.

O_N board of the ship in which Charlotte and Mademoiselle were embarked, was an officer of large unincumbered fortune and elevated rank, and whom I shallcall Crayton.

He was one of those men, who, having travelled in their youth, pretend to have contracted a peculiar fondness for every thing foreign, and to hold in contempt the productions of their own country; and this affected partiality extended even to the women.

With him therefore the blufhing modefly and unaffected fimplicity of Charlotte paffed unnoticed; but the forward pertnefs of La Rue, the freedom of her conversation, the elegance of her person, mixed with a certain engaging je ne sais quoi, persectly enchanted him.

The reader, no doubt, has already developed the character of La Rue; deligning, artful and felfish, she had accepted the devoirs of Belcour, because she was heartily weary of the retired life the led at the fehool, wished to be releafed from what she deemed a slavery, and to return to that vortex of folly and diffipation which had once plunged her into the deepest misery; but her plan, she flattered herfelf, was now better formed: fhe refolved to put herfelf under the protection of no man, till she had first secured a settlement; but the clandestine manner in which she left Madame Du Pont's, prevented her putting this plan in execution, though Belcour folemnly protested he would make her a handfome fettlement the moment they arrived at Portfmouth. This he afterwards contrived to evade by a pretended hurry of business; La Rue readily conceiving he never meant to fulfil his promife, determined to change her battery, and attack the heart of Colonel Crayton. She foon discovered the partiality he entertained for her nation; and having imposed on him a seigned tale of distress, reprefented Belcour as a villain who had feduced her from her friends under promife of marriage, and afterwards betrayed her, pretending great remorfe for the errors fhe had committed, and declaring that whatever her affection might have been, it was now entirely extinguished, and the withed for nothirsy more than an opportunity to leave a course of life which her foul abhored; but the had no friends to apply to; they had all renounced her, and guilt and mifery would undoubtedly be her future portion through life.

Crayton was possessed of many amiable qualities; though the peculiar trait in his character, which we have already mentioned, in a great measure threw a shade over them. He was beloved for his humanity and benevolence by all who knew him; but he was easy and unsuspicious himself, and became a dupe to the artisice of others.

He was, when very young, united to an amiable Parifian lady, and perhaps it was his affection for her that laid the foundation for the partiality he ever retained for the whole nation. He had by her one daughter, who entered into the world but a few hours before her mother left it. This lady was univerfally beloved and admired, being endowed with all the virtues of her mother, without the weakness of the father: she was married to Major Beauchamp, and was at this time in the same sleet with her father, attending her husband to New-York.

Crayton was melted by the affected contrition and diffress of La Rue: he would converse with her for hours, read to her, play cards with her, listen to all her complaints, and promise to protect her to the utmost of his power. La Rue easily saw his character; her fole aim was to awaken a paffion in his bosom that might turn out to her advantage; and in this aim she was but too successful; for before the voyage was finished, the infatuated Colonel gave her from under his hand a promise of marriage on their arrival at New-York, under forseiture of sive thousand pounds.

And how did our poor Charlotte pass her time during a tedious and tempessuous passage? Naturally delicate, the fatigue and sickness which she endured, rendered her so weak as to be almost entirely confined to her bed: yet the kindness and attention of Montraville in some measure contributed to alleviate her sufferings, and the hope of hearing from her friends soon after her arrival, kept up her spirits, and cheered many a gloomy hour.

But during the voyage a great revolution took place, not only in the fortune of La Rue but in the bofom of Belcour: whilst in purfuit of his amour with Mademoifelle, he had attended little to the interesting, unobtrusive charms of Charlotte; but when, cloyed by possession, and disgusted with the art and distinulation of the one, he beheld the simplicity and gentleness of the other, the contrast became too striking, not to fill him at once with surprize and admiration. He frequently conversed with Charlotte; he found her fensible, well informed, but diffident and unaffuming. The languor which the fatigue of her body and perturbation of her mind fpread over her delicate features, ferved only in his opinion, to render her more lovely: he knew that Montraville did not defign to marry her, and he formed a refolution to endeavor to gain her himfelf, whenever Montraville fhould leave her.

Let not the reader imagine Belcour's defigns were honorable. Alas! when once a woman has forgot the respect due to herself, by yielding to the folicitations of illicit love, she loses all her consequence, even in the eyes of the man whose art has betrayed her, and for whose sake she has facrificed every valuable consideration.

The heedless Fair, who koops to guilty joys, A man may pity....but he must despise.

Nay, every libertine will think he has a right to infult her with his licentious passion; and should the unhappy creature shrink from the infolent overture, he will sneeringly taunt her with pretence of modesty.

CHAPTER XVII.

A WEDDING.

On the day before their arrival at New-York, after dinner, Crayton arole from his feat, and, placing himself by Mademoiselle, thus addressed the company:....

"As we are now nearly arrived at our destined port, I think it but my duty to inform you, my friends, that this lady," (taking her hand,) "has placed herfelf under my protection. I have feen and feverely felt the anguish of her heart, and through every shade which cruelty or malice may throw over her. can discover the most amiable qualities. I thought it but necessary to mention my efteem for her before our difembarkation, as it is my fixed resolution, the morning after we land, to give her an undoubted title to my favor and protection by honorably uniting my fate to hers. I would wish every gentleman here, therefore, to remember that ther honor henceforth is mine; and," continued he, looking at Belcour, "fhould any man VOL. I.

prefume to fpeak in the least difrespectfully of her, I shall not hefitate to pronounce him a scoundrel."

Belcour cast at him a smile of contempt, and bowing prosoundly low, wished Mademoiselle much joy in the proposed union; and assuring the Colonel that he need not be in the least apprehensive of any one throwing the least odium on the character of his lady, shook him by the hand with ridiculous gravity, and left the cabbin.

The truth was, he was glad to be rid of La Rue, and fo he was but freed from her, he cared not who fell a victim to her infamous arts.

The inexperienced Charlotte was anonished at what she heard. She thought La Rue had, like herself, only been urged by the force of her attachment to Belcour, to quit her friends, and follow him to the feat of war:
how wonderful then, that she should resolve to marry another man! It was certainly extremely wrong. It was indelicate. She mentioned her thoughts to Montraville. He laughed at her simplicity, called her a little ideot, and patting her on the cheek, said she knew nothing of the world. "If the world
sanctifies such things, 'tis a very bad world,
It think,' faid Charlotte. "Why I always anderstood that they were to have been married when they arrived at New-York. I am fure Mademoifelle told me Belcour promifed to marry her.''

"Well, and suppose he did?"

"Why, he should be obliged to keep his word, I think."

"Well, but I suppose he has changed his mind," faid Montraville, "and then, you know the case is altered."

Charlotte looked at him attentively for a moment. A full fense of her own situation rushed upon her mind. She burst into tears, and remained silent. Montraville too well understood the cause of her tears. He kitsed her cheek, and bidding her not make herself uneasy, unable to bear the silent but keen remonstrance, hastily lest her.

The next morning by fun-rife they found themselves at anchor before the city of New-York. A boat was ordered to convey the ladies on shore. Crayton accompanied them; and they were shown to a house of public entertainment. Scarcely were they seated when the door opened, and the Colonel sound himself in the arms of his daughter, who had landed a few minutes before him. The sirft transport of meeting subsided, Crayton introduced his daughter to Mademoiselle La Rue, as an old friend of her mother's, (for the artful French woman had really made it appear to the credulous Colonel that the was in the fame convent with his first wise, and though much younger, had received many tokens of her esteem and regard.)

"If, Mademoifelle," faid Mrs. Beauchamp, "you were the friend of my mother, you must be worthy the esteem of all good hearts."

"Mademoiselle will soon honor our family," said Crayton, "by supplying the place that valuable woman filled; and as you are married, my dear, I think you will not blame—"

"Hush, my dear Sir," replied Mrs. Beauchamp: "I know my duty too well to ferutinize your conduct. Be assured, my dear sather, your happiness is mine. I shall rejoice in it, and sincerely love the person who contributes to it. But tell me," continued she, turning to Charlotte, "who is this lovely girl? Is she your sister, Mademoiselle?"

A blufh, deep as the glow of the carnation, fuffuled the cheeks of Charlotte.

"It is a young lady," replied the Colonel, "who came in the fame veffel with us from England." He then drew his daughter afide, and told her in a whifper, Charlotte was the miftrefs of Montraville.

"What a pity!" faid Mrs. Beauchamp foftly, (casting a most compassionate glance at her.) "But surely her mind is not deprayed. The goodness of her heart is depicted in her ingenuous countenance."

Charlotte caught the word pity. "And am I already fallen fo low?" faid fhe. A figh efcaped her, and a tear was ready to flart, but Montraville appeared, and fhe checked the rifing emotion. Mademoifelle went with the Colonel and his daughter to another apartment. Charlotte remained with Montraville and Belcour. The next morning the Colonel performed his promife and La Rue became in due form Mrs. Crayton, exulted in her own good fortune, and dared to look with an eye of contempt on the unfortunate but far less guilty Charlotte.

AND OF THE FIRST VOLUME.

Charlotte Temple.

Α

TALE OF TRUTH.

By MRS. ROWSON,

LATE OF THE NEW THEATRE, PHILADELPHIA ?

AUTHOR OF VICTORIA, THE INQUISITOR, FILLE DE CHAMBRE, &c.

She was her parents' only joy:
They had but one—one darling child.
ROMEO AND GULIER

Her form was faultless; and her mind, Untainted yet by art, Was noble, just, humane and kind, And virtue warm'd her heart, But ah! the cruel spoiler came......

WOL. II.

FIFTH AMERICAN EDITION.

HARRISBURGH, PENNSYL.

PRINTED FOR MATHEW CAREY OF PHILADELPHIA,
BY GONN WYETH.

4 8 0 2.

. 11.

, , ,

enio ,

Charlotte Temple.

CHAPTER XVIII.

-

REFLECTIONS.

"AND am I indeed fallen fo low," faid Charlotte, "as to be only pitied? Will the voice of approbation no more meet my ear? and shall I never again possess a friend, whose face will wear a smile of joy, whenever I approach? Alas! how thoughtlefs, how dreadfully imprudent have I been! I know not which is most painful to endure, the sneer of contempt, or the glance of compassion, which is depicted in the various countenances of my own fex: they are both equally humiliating. Ah! my dear parents, could you now fee the child of your affections, the daughter whom you so dearly loved, a poor folitary being, without fociety, here wearing out her heavy hours in deep regret and anguish of heart, no kind friend of her own sex to whom she can unbosom her griefs, no beloved mother, no woman of character to appear in her company; and, low as your Charlotte is fallen, she cannot associate with infamy,"

These were the painful restections which occupied the mind of Charlotte. Montraville had placed her in a fmall house, a few miles from New-York: he gave her one female attendant, and supplied her with what money flie wanted; but bufiness and pleasure so entirely occupied his time, that he had little to devote to the woman whom he had brought from all her connections and robbed of innocence. Sometimes, indeed, he would steal out at the close of evening, and pass a few hours with her; and then fo much was the attached to him, that all her forrows were forgotten while bleft with his fociety: flie would enjoy a walk by moonlight, or fit by him in a little arbor at the bottom of the garden, and play on the harp, accompanying it with her plaintive, harmonious voice. often, very often, did he promise to renew his vifits, and, forgetful of his promife, leave her to mourn her disappointment. What painful hours of expectation would fhe pass! fhe would fit at a window which looked toward a field he used to cross, counting the minutes, and straining her eyes to catch the first glimpfe of his perfon, till, blinded with tears of disappointment, she would lean her head on her hands, and give free vent to her forrows: then catching at fome new hope, fhe would again renew her watchful position, till the shades of evening enveloped every object in a dufky cloud: fhe would then renew her complaints, and with a heart burfting with disappointed love and wounded sensibility, retire to a bed which remorfe had strewed with thorns, and court in vain that comforter of weary nature (who seldom visits the unhappy) to come and steep her senses in oblivion.

Who can form an adequate idea of the forrow that preyed upon the mind of Charlotte? The wife, whose breast glows with affection for her hufband, and who in return meets only indifference, can but faintly conceive her anguish. Dreadfully painful is the fituation of fuch a woman; but fhe has many comforts, of which our poor Charlotte was deprived. The duteous, faithful wife, though treated with indifference, has one folid pleafure within her own bosom: she can reflect that fhe has not deferved neglect---that fhe has ever fulfilled the duties of her station with the strictest exactness; she may hope, by constant assiduity and unremitted attention, to recall her wanderer, and be doubly happy in his returning affection; flie knows he cannot leave her to unite himself to another: he cannot cast her out to poverty and contempt. She looks around her, and fees the fmile of friendly welcome, or the tear of affectionate confolation, on the face of every person whom the favors with her efteem; and from all thefe circumstances, she gathers comfort; but the poor girl, by thoughtless passion led astray, who, in parting with her honor, has forfeited the efteem of the very man to whom she has facrificed every thing dear and valuable in life, feels his indifference to be the fruit of her own folly, and laments her want of power to recall his lost affection: the knows, there is no tiè but honor, and that, in a man who has been guilty of feduction, is but very feeble; he may leave her in a moment to fhame and want; he may marry and forfake her forever; and should he do fo, she has no redrefs, no friendly foothing companion to pour into her wounded mind the balm of confolation, no benevolent hand to lead her back to the path of rectitude; the has difgraced her friends, forfeited the good opinion of the world, and undone herfelf. She feels herfelf a poor folitary being in the midst of furrounding multitudes; flame bows her to the earth, remorfe tears her distracted mind, and guilt, poverty, and difease close the dreadful scene; she finks unnoticed to oblivion. The finger of contempt may point out, to some passing daughter of youthful mirth, the humble bed where lies this frail fifter of mortality: and will she, in the unbounded gaiety of her heart, exult in her own unblemished fame, and triumph over the filent ashes of the dead? Oh no! she has a heart of senfibility, the will flop, and thus address the unhappy victim of folly :...

"Thou hadft thy faults; but furely thy fufferings have expiated them: thy errors brought thee to an early grave; but thou wert a fellow creature...thou haft been un-happy....then be those errors forgotten."

Then, as she stoops to pluck the noxious weed from off the fod, a tear will fall, and confecrate the spot to Charity.

Forever honored be the facred drop of humanity: the angel of mercy shall record its source, and the soul from whence it sprang shall be immortal.

My dear Madam, contract not your brow into a frown of disapprobation. I mean not to extenuate the faults of those unhappy women who fall victims to guilt and folly; but furely, when we reflect how many errors we are ourselves subject to, how many secret faults lie hid in the recesses of our hearts, which we should blush to have brought into open day (and yet those faults require the lenity and pity of a benevolent judge, or awful would be our prospect of futurity) I say, my dear Madam, when we consider this, we furely may pity the faults of others.

Believe me, many an unfortunate female, who has once strayed into the thorny paths of vice, would gladly return to virtue, was any generous friend to endeavor to raise and re-assure her; but alas! it cannot be, you fay; the world would deride and scoff. Then let me tell you, Madam, 'tis a very unfeeling world, and does not deferve half the bleffings which a bountiful Providence showers upon it.

110 CHARLOTTE.

Oh, thou benevolent giver of all good! how shall we, erring mortals, dare to look up to thy mercy in the great day of retribution, if we now uncharitably refuse to overlook the errors, or alleviate the miseries, of our fellow-creatures.

CHAPTER XIX.

A MISTAKE DISCOVERED.

Julia Franklin was the only child of a man of large property, who left her independent mistress of an unincumbered income of seven hundred a year, at the age of eighteen; she was a girl of a lively disposition, and humane, susceptible heart: she resided in New-York with an uncle, who loved her too well, and had too high an opinion of her prudence, to scrutinize her actions so much as would have been necessary with many young ladies, who were not blest with her discretion: she was, at the time Montraville arrived at New-York, the life of society, and the universal toast. Montraville was introduced to her by the following accident.—

One night when he was upon guard, a dreadful fire broke out near Mr. Franklin's house, which, in a few hours, reduced that and several others to ashes; fortunately no lives were lost, and, by the assiduity of the foldiers, much valuable property was saved from the flames. In the midft of the confusion, an old gentleman came up to Montraville, and, putting a small box into his hands, cried,.... Keep it, my good Sir, till I come to you again;" and then rushing again into the thickest of the croud, Montraville faw him no more. He waited till the fire was quite extinguished, and the mob disperfed; but in vain: the old gentleman did not appear to claim his property; and Montraville, fearing to make an enquiry, left he should meet with impostors who might lay claim, without any legal right, to the box, carried it to his lodgings, and locked it up: he naturally imagined, that the person who committed it to his care, knew him, and would in a day or two, reclaim it; but feveral weeks passed on, and no enquiry being made, he began to be uneafy, and refolved to examine the contents of the box, and if they were, as he supposed, valuable, to spare no pains to discover the owner, and restore them to him. Upon opening it, he found it contained jewels to a large amount, about two hundred pounds in money, and a miniature picture fet for a bracelet. On examining the picture, he thought he had fomewhere feen features very like it, but could not recollect where. A few days after, being at a public affembly; he faw Miss Franklin, and the likenos was too evident to be mistaken: enquired among his brother officers if any. of them knew her, and found one who was upon terms of intimacy with the family: "then introduce me to her immediately," faid he, "for I am certain I can inform her of fomething which will give her peculiar pleafure."

He was immediately introduced, found fhe was the owner of the jewels, and was invited to breakfast the next morning, in order to their restoration. This whole evening Montraville was honored with Julia's hand; the lively fallies of her wit, the elegance of her manner, powerfully charmed him; he forgot Charlotte, and indulged himfelf in laying every thing that was polite and tender to Julia. But on retiring, recollection returned... "What am I about?" faid he, "though I cannot marry Charlotte, I cannot be villain enough to forfake her, nor must I dare to trifle with the heart of Julia Franklin. I will return this box," faid he, "which has been the fource of fo much uneafiness already, and in the evening pay a visit to my poor melancholy Charlotte, and endeavor to forget this: fascinating Julia."

He arose, dressed himself, and taking the picture out, "I will reserve this from the rest," faid he, " and by presenting it to her when she thinks it is lost, enhance the value of the obligation." He repaired to Mr. Franklin's, and found Julia in the breakfast pariour alone.

"How happy am I, Madam," faid he, "that being the fortunate inftrument of faving these jewels, has been the means of procuring me the acquaintance of so amiable a lady. There are the jewels and money all fase."

"But where is the picture, Sir?" faid Julia.

"Here, Madam. I would not willingly part with it."

"It is the portrait of my mother," faid fhe, taking it from him: "'tis all that remains." She pressed it to her lips, and a tear trembled in her eyes. Montraville glanced his eyes on her grey night gown and black ribbon, and his own feelings prevented a reply.

Julia Franklin was the very reverse of Charlotte Temple: she was tall, elegantly shaped, and possessed much of the air and manner of a woman of fashion; her complexion was a clear brown, enlivened with the glow of health; her eyes, full, black, and sparkling, darted their intelligent glances through long silken lashes; her hair was shining brown, and her features regular and striking; there was an air of innocent gaiety that played about her countenance, where good humor sat triumphant.

"I have been mistaken," said Montraville, "I imagined I loved Charlotte; but alas! I am too late convinced my attachment to her was merely the impulse of a moment. I fear I have not only entailed lasting misery on that poor gir!, but also thrown a barrier in the way of my own happiness, which it will be impossible to surmount. I feel I love Julia Franklin with ardor and sincerity; yet, when in her presence, I am sensible of my own inability to offer a heart worthy her acceptance, and remain filent."

Full of these painful thoughts, Montraville walked out to see Charlotte: she saw him approach, and ran out to meet him; she ban-ished from her countenance the air of discontent which ever appeared when he was absent, and met him with a smile of joy.

"I thought you had forgot me, Montraville," faid the, "and was very unhappy."

"I shall never forget you, Charlotte," he replied, pressing her hand.

The uncommon gravity of his countenance, and the brevity of his reply, alarmed her.

"You are not well," faid she; "your hand is hot; your eyes are heavy; you are very ill."

116 CHARLOTTE.

"I am a villian," faid he mentally, as he turned from her to hide his emotions.

"But come," continued flic tenderly, you shall go to bed, and I will fit by and watch you; you will be better when you have slept:"

Montraville was glad to retire, and by pretending fleep, concealed the agitation of his mind from her penetrating eye. Charlotte watched by him till a late hour, and then lying foftly down by his fide, funk into a profound fleep, from whence she awoke not till late the next morning.

", C1 "C'."

្រាក្សាស្ត្រី។ ស្ត្រីក្រោះ បានស្ត្រីស្ត្រី។ ឯកស្ត្រី ប្រើប្រាស់ ស្ត្រីស្ត្រី ស្ត្រីស្ត្រី ស្ត្រីស្ត្រី ស្ត្រីស្ត្រី ស្ត្រី

OHAPTER XX:

Virtue never appears to amiable as when reaching forth har hand to raife a fallen lifter.

Were Charlotte awoke, she missed Montraville; but thinking he might have arisen early to enjoy the beauties of the morning, she was preparing to follow him, when casting her eye on the table, she saw a note, and opening it hastily, found these words....

"My dear Charlotte must not be surprised if she does not see me again for some time: unavoidable business will prevent me that pleasure: be affured I am quite well this morning; and what your fond imagination magnified into illness, was nothing more than satigue, which a few hours rest has entirely removed. Make yourself happy, and be certain of the unalterable friendship of MONTRAVILLE."

"Friendship!" faid Charlotte emphatically, as she sinished the note, "is it come to this at last! Alas! poor forsaken Char-Montraville is no longer interested in thy happiness; and shame, remorfe, and disappointed love will henceforth be thy only attendants."

Though these were the ideas that involuntarily rushed upon the mind of Charlotte as she perused the fatal note, yet after a sew hours had elapsed, the syren Hope again took possession of her bosom, and she statered herself she could, on a secend perusal, discover an air of tenderness in the sew lines he had lest, which had at first escaped her notice. "He certainly cannot be so base as to leave me," said she; "and in stilling himself my sriend, does he not promise to protest me? I will not torment myself with these causeless sears; I will place a considence in his honor, and sure he will not be so unjust as to abuse it:"

Just as she had by this manner of reasoning brought her mind to some tolerable degree of composure, she was surprised by a visit from Belcour. The dejection visible in Charlotte's countenance, her swoln eyes and neglected attire, at once told him she was unhappy: he made no doubt but Montraville had, by his coldness, alarmed her suspicions, and was resolved, if possible, to rouse her to jealously, urge her to reproach him, and by that means occasion a breach between them. "If I can once convince her that she has a rival," faid he, "fhe will liften to my paffion, if it is only to revenge his flights." Belcour knew but little of the female heart; and what he did know, was only of those of loose and diffolute lives. He had no idea, that a woman might fall a victim to imprudence, and yet retain so strong a sense of honor, as to reject with horror and contempt every solicitation to a second sault. He never imagined that a gentle, generous semale heart, once tenderly attached, when treated with unkindness, might break, but would never harbor a thought of revenge.

His visit was not long; but before he went, he fixed a scorpion in the heart of Charlotte whose venom embittered every suture hour of her life.

We will now return for a moment to Colonel Crayton. He had been three months married, and in that little time had discovered that the conduct of his lady was not so prudent as it ought to have been; but remonstrance was vain; her temper was violent; and to the Colonel's great misfortune he had conceived a fincere affection for her: she saw her own power, and, with the art of a Circe, made every action appear to him in what light she pleased: his acquaintance laughed at his blindness, his friends pitied his infatuation, his amiable daughter, Mrs. Beauchamp, in secret, deplored the loss of her father's affection, and grieved that he should be so entirely swayed by an artful and, she much seared, infamous woman.

Mrs. Beauchamp was mild and engaging; the loved not the hurry and builte of a city, and had prevailed on her hufband to take a house a few miles from New-York. Chance led her into the fame neighborhood with Charlotte: their houses stood within a short space of each other, and their gardens joined: she had not been long in her new habitation before the figure of Charlotte struck her; she recollected her interesting features; the faw-the melancholy, fo conspicuous in her countenance, and her heart bled at the reflection, that perhaps deprived of honor, friends, and all that was valuable in life, she was doomed to linger out a wretched existence in a ftrange land, and fink brokenhearted into an untimely grave. "Would to heaven I could fnatch her from fo hard a fate," faid she: "but the merciles world has barred the doors of compassion against a poor weak girl, who, perhaps, had the one kind friend to raife and re-assure her, would gladly return to peace and virtue. even the woman who dares to pity, and endeavor to recall a wandering fifter, incurs the fneer of contempt and ridicule, for an action in which even angels are faid to rejoice."

The longer Mrs. Beauchamp was a witness to the solitary life Charlotte led, the more she wished to speak to her; and often as she saw her cheeks wet with the tears of anguish, she would say..." dear sufferer, how gladly would I pour into your heart the balm of consolation, were it not for the fear of derision."

But an accident foon happened, which made her resolve to brave even the scoffs of the world, rather than not enjoy the heavenly satisfaction of comforting a desponding sellow-creature.

Mrs. Beauchamp was an early rifer. She was one morning walking in the garden, leaning on her hufband's arm, when the found of a harp attracted their notice: they liftened attentively, and heard a foft melodious voice diffinctly fing the following flanzas:---

Thou glorious orb, supremely bright,
Just rising from the sea,
To chear all nature with thy light,
What are thy beams to me?

In vain thy glories bid me rise, To hail the new-born day; Alas! my morning sacrifice Is still to weep and pray. For what are nature's charms combin'd, To one, whose weary breast Can neither peace or comfort find, Nor friend whereon to rest?

Oh, never! never! whilst I live Can my heart's anguish cease: Come, friendly death, thy mandate give, And let me be at peace.

"'Tis poor Charlotte!" faid Mrs. Beauchamp, the pellucid drop of humanity ftealing down her cheek.

Captain Beauchamp was alarmed at her emotion. "What Charlotte?" faid he; " do vou know her?"

In the accent of a pitying angel did she disclose to her husband, Charlotte's unhappy fituation, and the frequent wish she had formed of being ferviceable to her. "I fear," continued the, "the poor girl has been bafely betrayed; and if I thought you would not blame me, I would pay her a visit, offer her my friendship, and endeavor to restore to her heart that peace the feems to have loft, and fo pathetically laments. Who knows, my dear," laying her hand affectionately on his arm, "who knows, but she has left some kind, affectionate parents to lament her errors, and would fhe return, they might with rapture receive the poor penitent, and wash away her faults in tears of joy. Oh! what a glorious reflection would it be for me, could I be the happy instrument of restoring her. Her heart may not be deprayed, Beauchamp."

"Exalted woman!" cried Beauchamp, embracing her, "how dost thou rise every moment in my esteem. Follow the impulse of thy generous heart, my Emily. Let prudes and fools censure, if they dare, and blame a sensibility they never seit: I will exultingly tell them that the truly virtuous heart is ever inclined to pity and forgive the errors of its fellow-creatures."

A beam of exulting joy played round the animated countenance of Mrs. Beauchamp, at these encomiums bestowed on her by abeloved husband; the most delightful sensations pervaded her heart, and, having breakfasted, she prepared to visit Charlotte.

CHAPTER XXI.

A BENEVOLENT VISIT.

: 4 : De

Teach me to feel another's woe;
To hide the fault 1 fee:
That mercy I to others fnow,
That mercy flow to me. POPE.

When Mrs. Beauchamp was dreffed, the began to feel embarraffed at the thought of beginning an acquaintance with Charlotte, and was diffrested how to make the first visit. "I cannot go without some introduction," said she. "It will look like impertinent curiosity." At length, recollecting herself, she stepped into the garden, and gathering a sew sine cucumbers, took them in her hand by way of apology for her visit.

A glow of confcious shame vermillioned Charlotte's face as Mrs. Beauchamp entered.

"You will pardon me, Madam," faid the, "for not having before paid my refpects to fo amiable a neighbor; but we English people always keep up, wherever we go, that referve which is the characteristic of our nation. I have taken the liberty to bring you a few encumbers; for I observed you had none in your garden."

Charlotte, though naturally polite and well bred, was so confused she could hardly speak. Her kind visitor endeavored to relieve her by not noticing her embarrassment. "I am come, Madam," continued she, "to request you to spend the day with me. I shall be alone; and as we are both strangers in this country, we may hereafter be extremely happy in each other's friendship."

"Your friendship, Madam," said Charlotte, blushing, "is an honor to all who are savored with it. Little as I have seen of this a part of the world, I am no stranger to Mrs. Beauchamp's goodness of heart and known humanity: but my friendship......" She paused, glanced her eye upon her own visible situation, and, spite of her endeavors to suppress them, burst into tears,

Mrs. Beauchamp gueffed the fource from whence these tears flowed. "You feem unhappy, Madam," said she: "shall I be thought worthy your considence? will you entrust me with the cause of your sorrow, and rest on my assurances to exert my utmost power to serve you?" Charlotte returned a look of gratitude, but could not speak, and Mrs. Beauchamp continued.... My heart was interested in your behalf the first moment I saw you; and I only lament I had not made earlier overtures, towards an acquaintance; but I slatter myself you will henceforth consider me as your friend."

"Oh, Madam!" cried Charlotte, "I have forfeited the good opinion of all my friends; I have forfaken them, and undone myfelf."

"Come, come, my dear," faid Mrs. Beauchamp, "you must not indulge these gloomy thoughts: you are not, I hope, so unhappy as you imagine yourself: endeavor to be composed, and let me be savored with your company at dinner, when, if you can bring yourself to think me your friend, and repose a considence in me, I am ready to convince you that it shall not be abused." She then arose and bade her good morning.

At the dining hour, Charlotte repaired to Mrs. Beauchamp's, and during dinner affumed as composed an aspect as possible; but when the cloth was removed, she summoned all her resolution and determined to make Mrs. Beauchamp acquainted with every circumstance preceding her elopement, and the earnest defire she had to quit a way of life so repugnant to her feelings.

With the benignant afpect of an angel of mercy did Mrs. Beauchamp liften to the artlefs tale; fhe was shocked to the soul to find how large a share La Rue had in the seduction of this amiable girl, and a tear sell when she resected that so vile a woman was now the wife of her father. When Charlotte had sinished, she gave her a little time to collect her scattered spirits, and then asked her, if she had never written to her friends?

"Oh yes, Madam," faid fhe, "frequently; but I have broke their hearts; they are all either dead or have cast me off forever, for I have never received a single line from them."

"I rather suspect," faid Mrs. Beauchamp, "they have never had your letters: but suppose you were to hear from them, and they were willing to receive you, would you then leave this cruel Montraville, and return to them?"

"Would I!" faid Charlotte, classing her hands: "would not the poor failor, tost on a tempessuous ocean, threatened every moment with death, gladly return to the shore he had left to trust to its deceitful calmness? Oh, my dear Madam, I would return, though to do it I were obliged to walk barefooted and beg a feanty pittance of each traveller to fupport my existence. I would endure it all cheerfully, could I but once more see my dear blessed mother, hear her pronounce my pardon, and bless me before I died; but alas! I shall never see her more; she has blotted the ungrateful Charlotte from her remembrance, and I shall sink to the grave loaded with her's and my father's curse."

Mrs. Beauchamp endeavored to footh her. "You shall write to them again," said she, "and I will see that the letter is sent by the first packet that fails for England; in the mean time keep up your spirits, and hope for every thing, by daring to deserve it."

She then turned the conversation, and Charlotte having taken a cup of tea, wished her benevolent friend a good evening ĸ.

GHAPTER XXII.

SORROWS OF THE HEART'.

WHEN Charlotte returned home, she endeavored to collect her thoughts; and took up a pen in order to address those dear parents, whom, fpite of her errors, the still loved with the utmost tenderness; but vain was every effort to write with the least coherence; her tears fell fo fast they almost blinded her: and as fhe proceeded to describe her unhappy fituation, fhe became fo agitated, that she was obliged to give over the attempt, and retire to bed, where, overcome with the fatigue her mind had undergone, the fell into a flumber, which greatly refreshed her. She arofe in the morning with spirits more adequate to the painful talk she had to perform, and, after feveral attempts, at length concluded the following letter to her mother :.....

To MRS. TEMPLE.

New-York.

"WILL my once kind, my ever-beloved mother, deign to receive a letter from her guilty, but repentant child? or has she, justly incenfed at my ingratitude, driven the unhappy Charlotte from her remembrance? Alas! thou much injured mother! shouldst thou even disown me, I dare not complain, because I know I have deserved it; but yet, believe me, guilty as I am, and cruelly as I have disappointed the hopes of the fondest parents that ever girl had, even in the moment when, forgetful of my duty, I fled from you and happiness, even then I loved you most, and my heart bled at the thought of what you would fuffer. Oh! never, never! while I have existence, will the agony of that moment be erafed from my memory. It feemed like the feparation of foul from body.---What can I plead in excuse for my conduct? alas! nothing! That I loved my feducer is but too true! yet powerful as that passion is, when operating in a young heart glowing with fenfibility, it never would have conquered my affection to you, my beloved parents, had I not been encouraged, nay, urged to take the fatal step by one of my own fex, who, under the mask of friendship, drew me on to ruin. Yet think not your Charlotte was fo loft as to voluntarily rufh into a life of infamy: No, my dear mother, deceived by the specious appearance of my betrayer, and every suspicion lulled asleep by the most solemn promifes of marriage, I thought now those promises would so easily be forgotten. I never once reflected that the man who could stoop to seduction, would not hesitate to forfake the wretched object of his passion, whenever his capricious heart grew weary of her When we arrived at this place, tenderness. I vainly expected him to fulfil his engagements; but was at last fatally convinced he had never intended to make me his wife, or if he had once thought of it, his mind was now altered. I fcorned to claim from his humanity what I could not obtain from his love: I was confcious of having forfeited the only gem that could render me respectable in the eye of the world. I locked my forrows in my own bosom, and bore my injuries in filence. But how shall I proceed?---This man, this cruel Montraville, for whom I facrificed honor, happiness, and the love of my friends, no longer looks on me with affection, but scorns the credulous girl whom his art has made miferable. Could you fee me, my dear parents, without fociety, without friends, flung with remorfe, and (I feel the burning blush of shame die my cheeks while I write it) tortured with the pangs of disappointed love; cut to the foul by the in-difference of him, who, having deprived me of every other comfort, no longer thicks it worth his while to footh the heart where he has planted the thorn of never-ceafing regret. My daily employment is to think of you and weep, to pray for your happiness, and deplore my own folly: my nights are scarce more happy; for if by chance I close my weary eyes, and hope fome fmall forgetfulness of forrow, some little time to pass in fweet oblivion, fancy, still waking wafts me home to you: I fee your beloved forms: I kneel and hear the bleffed words of peace and pardon. Extatic joy pervades my foul; I reach my arms to catch your dear embraces; the motion chases the illusive dream; I wake to real mifery. At other times I fee my father angry and frowning, point to horrid eaves, where, on the cold damp ground, in the agonies of death, I fee my dear mother and my revered grand-father. I strive to raife you; you push me from you, and shricking, cry...." Charlotte, thou hast murdered me!" Horror and despair tear every tortured nerve; I flart, and leave my refliefs bed, weary and unrefreshed.

"Schocking as these resections are, I have yet one more dreadful than the rest. Mother, my dear mother! do not let me quite break your heart when I tell you, in a few months I shall bring into the world an innotent witness of my guilt. Oh my bleeding heart! I shall bring a poor little helpless creature, heir to insamy and shame.

- "This alone has urged me once more to address you, to interest you in behalf of this poor unborn, and begayou to extend your protection to the child of your lost Charlotte: for my own part, I have wrote so often, so frequently have pleaded for forgiveness, and entreated to be received once more beneath the paternal roof, that having received no answer, nor even one line, I much fear you have cast me from you forever.
- "But fure you cannot refuse to protect my innocent infant; it partakes not of its mother's guilt. Oh my father, oh beloved mother, now do I feel the anguish I inflicted on your hearts recoiling with double force upon my own.
- "If my child should be a girl (which heaven forbid) tell her the unhappy sate of her mother, and teach her to avoid my errors; if a boy, teach him to lament my miseries, but tell him not who insticted them, lest, in wishing to revenge his mother's injuries, he should wound the peace of his sather.
- "And now, dear friends of my foul, kind guardians of my infancy, farewell. I feel I never more must hope to see you; the anguish of my heart strikes at the strings of life, and in a short time I shall be at rest... Oh! could I but receive your blessing and forgiveness before I died, it would smooth

136 CHARLOTTE.

my passage to the peaceful grave, and be a blessed foretasse of a happy eternity. I beseech you, curse me not, my adored parents; but let a tear of pity and pardon fall to the memory of your lost

CHARLOTTE."

CHAPTER XXIII.

A MAN MAY SMILE, AND SMILE, AND BE A VILLAIN.

W HILE Charlotte was enjoying fome finall degree of comfort in the confoling friendship of Mrs. Beauchamp, Montraville was advancing rapidly in his affection towards Mifs Franklin. Julia was an amiable girl; the faw only the fair fide of his character; the possessed an independent fortune, and refolved to be happy with the man of her heart, though his rank and fortune were by no means fo exalted as she had a right to expect; fhe faw the passion which Montraville ftruggled to conceal; fhe wondered at his timidity, but imagined the distance fortune had placed between them occasioned his backwardness. She therefore made every advance which strict prudence and a becoming modefty would permit. Montraville faw with pleasure he was not indifferent to her; but a fpark of honor which animated his bofom would not fuffer him to take advantage. of her partiality. He was well acquainted with Charlotte's fituation, and he thought there would be a double cruelty in forfaking her at fuch a time; and to marry Miss Franklin, while honor, humanity, every facred law, obliged him still to protect and support Charlotte, was a baseness at which his foul shuddered.

He communicated his uneafiness to Belcour: it was the very thing this pretended friend had wished. "And do you really,"
said he, laughing, "hesitate at marrying the lovely Julia, and becoming master of her fortune, because a little foolish, fond girl chose to leave her friends, and run away with you to America? Dear Montraville, act more like a man of sense; this whining, pining Charlotte, who occasions you so much uneasiness, would have eloped with somebody else, if she had not with you."

"Would to heaven," faid Montraville, "I had never feen her; my regard for her was but the momentary passion of desire; but I feel I shall love and revere Julia Franklin as long as I live; yet to leave poor Charlotte in her present situation would be cruel beyond description."

"Oh, my good fentimental friend," faid Belcour, "do you imagine that nobody has a right to provide for the brat but yourfelf?"

Montraville started. "Sure," faid he, "you cannot mean to infinuate that Charlotte is false."

"I don't infinuate it," faid Belçour, "I know it."

Montraville turned pale as ashes. "Then there is no faith in woman," faid he.

- "While I thought you attached to her," faid Belcour, with an air of indifference, "I never wished to make you uneasy by mentioning her persidy; but as I know you love and are beloved by Miss Franklin, I was determined not to let these foolish scruples of honor step between you and happiness, or your tenderness for the peace of a persidious girl, prevent your uniting yourself to a woman of honor."
- "Good heavens!" faid Montraville,--"what poignant reflections does a man endure who fees a lovely woman plunged in infamy, and is confcious he was her first feducer; but are you certain of what you fay, Belcour?"
- "So far," replied he, "that I myself have received advances from her, which I would not take advantage of out of regard to you: but hang it, think no more about her. I dined at Franklin's to-day, and Julia bid me seek and bring you to tea: so come along, my lad, make good use of opportunity, and seize the gifts of fortune while they are within your reach."

140 CHARLOTTE.

Montraville was too much agitated to pass a happy evening even in the company of Julia Franklin: he determined to vifit Charlotte early the next morning, tax her with her fallhood, and take an everlafting leave of her, but when the morning came he was commanded on duty, and for fix weeks was. prevented from putting his defign in execution. At length he found an hour to spare, and walked out to fpend it with Charlotte: it was near four o'clock in the afternoon when he arrived at her cottage: fhe was not in the parlour, and without calling her fervant, he walked up flairs, thinking to find her in her bed room. He opened the door, and the first object that met his eyes was Charlotte afleep on the bed, and Belcour by ker fide.

"Death and distraction," said he, stamping, "this is too much. Rife, villain, and desend yourself." Belcour sprang from the bed. The noise awoke Charlotte: terrified at the furious appearance of Montraville, and seeing Bescour with him in the chamber, she caught hold of his arm as he stood by the bed side, and eagerly asked what was the matter.

[&]quot;Treacherous, infamous girl," faid he, "can you afk? How came he here?" pointing to Belcour.

- "As heaven is my witness," replied she, weeping, "I do not know. I have not feen him for these three weeks."
- "Then you confess he sometimes visits you?"
 - "He came fometimes by your defire."
- "'Tis false; I never desired him to come, and you know I did not: but mark me, Charlotte, from this instant our connection is at an end. Let Belcour, or any other of your favored lovers, take you and provide for you; I have done with you forever."

He was then going to leave her; but ftarting wildly from the bed, she threw herself on her knees before him, protesting her innocence and entreating him not to leave her. "Oh, Montraville," said she, "kill-me, for pity's sake kill me, but do not doubt my fidelity. Do not leave me in this horrid situation; for the sake of your unborn child, oh! spurn not the wretched mother from you."

"Charlotte," faid he, with a firm voice,
"I shall take care that neither you nor your child want any thing in the approaching painful hour; but we meet no more." He then endeavored to raise her from the ground, but in vain; she clung about his knees, entreating him to believe her innocent, and

142 CHARLOTTE.

conjuring Belsour to clear up the dreadful myslery.

Belcour cast on Montraville a smile of contempt: it irritated him almost to madness; he broke from the seeble arms of the distressed girl; she shrieked and fell prostrate on the floor. Montraville instantly left the house and returned hastily to the city.

. WAPTER XXIV.

MYSTERY DEVELOPED.

Unfortunately for Charlotte, about three weeks before this unhappy rencontre, Captain Beauchamp, being ordered to Rhode Island, his lady had accompanied him, fo that Charlotte was deprived of her friendly advice and confoling fociety. The afternoon on which Montraville had visited her she had found herfelf languid and fatigued, and after making a very flight dinner had lain down to endeavor to recruit her exhaufted fpirits, and, contrary to her expectations, had fallen She had not been long lain down, when Belcour arrived, for he took every opportunity of vifiting her, and striving to awaken her resentment against Montraville, He enquired of the fervant where her miftrefs was, and being told fhe was afleep, took up a book to amufe himself: having fat a few minutes, he by chance cast his eyes towards the road, and faw Montraville approaching; he instantly conceived the dia-bolical scheme of ruining the unhappy Charlotte in his opinion for ever; he therefore flole foftly up flairs, and laying himfelf by her fide with the greatest precaution, for fear she should awake, was in that situation discovered by his credulous friend,

When Montraville fpurned the weeping Charlotte from him, and left her almost diftracted with terror and despair, Belcour raifed her from the floor, and leading her down flairs, assumed the part of a tender, consoling friend; she listened to the arguments he advanced with apparent composure; but this was only the calm of a moment: the remembrance of Montraville's recent cruelty, again rushed upon her mind: she pushed him from her with some violence, and crying, "Leave me, Sir, I befeech you leave me, for much I fear you have been the cause of my fidelity being suspected; go, leave me to the accumulated miferies my own imprudence has brought upon me."

She then left him with precipitation, and retiring to her own apartment, threw herfelf on the bed, and gave vent to an agony of grief which it is impossible to describe.

It now occurred to Belcour that she might possibly write to Montraville, and endeavor to convince him of her innocence: he was well aware of her pathetic remonstrances, and sensible of the tenderness of Montraville's heart, resolved to prevent any letters ever reaching him: he therefore called the fervant, and by the powerful perfuation of a bribe, prevailed with her to promife whatever letters her mistress might write, should be fent to him. He then left a polite, tender note for Charlotte, and returned to New-York. His first business was to seek Montraville, and endeavor to convince him that what had happened would ultimately tend to his happiness: he found him in his apartment, solitary, pensive, and wrapped in disagreeable restections.

- "Why how now, whining, pining lover?" faid he, clapping him on the fhoulder. Montraville flarted; a momentary flush of resentment crossed his cheek, but instantly gave place to a death-like paleness, occasioned by painful remembrance....remembrance awakened by that monitor, whom, though we may in vain endeavor, we can never entirely filence.
- "Belcour," faid he, "you have injured me in a tender point."
- "Prithee, Jack," replied Belcour, "do not make a ferious matter of it: how could I refuse the girl's advances? and thank heaven she is not your wife."
- "True," faid Montraville; "but she was innocent when I first knew her. It was I seven. 2.

duced her, Belcour. Had it not been for me, the had still been virtuous and happy in the affection and protection of her family."

- "Pshaw," replied Belcour, laughing, "if you had not taken advantage of her easy nature, some other would, and where is the difference, pray?"
- "I wished I had never feen her," cried he passionately, and starting from his feat, "Oh that cursed French woman," added he with vehemence, "had it not been for her, I might have been happy......" He paused.
- "With Julia Franklin," faid Belcour.---The name, like a fudden fpark of electric fire, feemed for a moment to suspend his faculties---for a moment he was transfixed; but recovering, he caught Belcour's hand, and cried---"Stop! ftop! I befeech you, name not the lovely Julia and the wretched Montraville in the same breath. I am a seducer, a mean, ungenerous feducer of unfufpecting innocence. I dare not hope that purity like her's would stoop to unite itself with black, premeditated guilt: yet by heavens I fwear, Belcour, I thought I loved the loft, abandoned Charlotte till I faw Julia--- I thought I never could forfake her; but the heart is deceitful, and I now ean plainly difcriminate between the impulse of a youthful passion, and the pure same of difinterested affection."

At that inftant Julia Franklin passed the window, leaning on her uncle's arm. She curtfeyed as the paffed, and with the bewitching fmile of modest chearfulness, cried.... "Do you bury yourselves in the house this fine evening, gents?" There was fomething in the voice! the manner! the look! that was altogether irrefiftible. "Perhaps she wishes my company," faid Montraville mentally, as he funtched up his hat: "If I tho't fhe loved me, I would confess my errors, and trust to her generosity to pity and pardon me." He foon evertook her, and offering her his arm, they fauntered to pleafant but unfrequented walks. Belcour drew Mr. Franklin on one fide and entered into a political discourse: they walked faster than the young people, and Belcour by fome means contrived entirely to lose fight of them. It was a fine evening in the beginning of autumn; the last remains of day-light faintly streaked the western sky, while the moon, with pale and virgin lustre in the room of gorgeous gold and purple, ornamented the canopy of heaven with filver, fleecy clouds, which now and then half hid her lovely face, and, by partly concealing, heightened every beauty; the zephyrs whilpered foftly thro' the trees, which now began to fleed their leafy honors; a folemn filence reigned: and to a happy mind an evening fuch as this would give ferenity, and calm, unruffled pleafure; but to Montraville, while it foothed the turbulence of his passions, it brought increase of melancholy reflections. Julia was leaning on his arm: he took her hand in his, and preffing it tenderly, fighed deeply, but continued filent. Julia was embarraffed; fhe wished to break a filence fo unaccountable, but was unable; fhe loved Montraville, fhe faw he was unhappy, and wished to know the cause of his uneafinefs, but that innate modefly, which nature has implanted in the female breaft, prevented her enquiring. "I am bad company, Miss Franklin," faid he, at last recollecting himfelf; "but I have met with something to-day that has greatly distressed me, and I cannot shake off the disagreeable inpression it has made on my mind."

"I am forry," fhe replied, "that you have any cause of inquietude. Iam sure if you were as happy as you deserve, and as all your friends wish you....." She hesitated. "And might I," replied he with some animation, "presume to rank the amiable Julia in that number?"

"Certainly," faid fhe, "the fervice you have rendered me, the knowledge of your worth, all combine to make me efteem you."

"Efteem, my lovely Julia," faid he paffionately, "is but a poor cold word. I would if I dared, if I thought I merited your attention....but no, I must not....honor forbids. I am beneath your notice, Julia, I am miserable and cannot hope to be otherwise."

" Alas!" faid Julia, "I pity you."

"Oh thou condescending charmer," said he, "how that sweet word chears my said heart. Indeed if you knew all, you would pity; but at the same time I fear you would despife me."

Just then they were again joined by Mr. Franklin and Belcour. It had interrupted an interesting discourse. They found it impossible to converse on indifferent subjects, and proceeded home in silence. At Mr. Franklin's door Montraville again pressed Julia's hand, and faintly articulating "good night," retired to his lodgings dispirited and wretched, from a consciousness that he deserved not the affection, with which he plainly saw he was honored.

CHAPTER XXV.

RECEPTION OF A LETTER.

"AND where now is our poor Charlotte?" faid Mr. Temple one evening, as the cold blafts of autumn whiftled rudely over the heath, and the yellow appearance of the diftant wood, spoke the near approach of winter. In vain the chearful fire blazed on the hearth, in vain was he furrounded by all the comforts of life; the parent was still alive in his heart, and when he thought that perhaps his once darling child was ere this exposed to all the miseries of want in a distant land, without a friend to footh and comfort her. without the benignant look of compassion to chear, or the angelic voice of pity to pour the balm of confolation on her wounded heart; when he thought of this, his whole foul diffolved in tenderness; and while he wiped the tear of anguish from the eye of his patient, uncomplaining Lucy, he struggled to suppress the sympathizing drop that started in his own. "Oh, my poor girl," said Mrs. Temple, "how must she be altered, esse furely fhe would have relieved our agonizing minds by one line to fay fhe lived....to fay fhe had not quite forgot the parents who almost idolized her."

"Gracious heaven!" faid Mr. Temple, flarting from his feat, "who would wish to be a father, to experience the agonizing pangs inflicted on a parent's heart by the ingratitude of a child?" Mrs. Temple wept: her father took her hand; he would have faid—"be comforted, my child"—but the words died on his tongue. The fad filence that ensued was interrupted by a loud rap at the door. In a moment a servant entered with a letter in his hand.

Mrs. Temple took it from him: fhe cast her eyes upon the superscription; she knew the writing---". Tis Charlotte," said she, eagerly breaking the seal, "she has not quite forgot us." But before she had half gone through the contents, a sudden sickness seized her; she grew cold and giddy, and putting it into her husband's hand, she cried.... "Read it: I cannot." Mr. Temple attempted to read it aloud, but frequently paused to give vent to his tears. "My poor deluded child," said he, when he had finished.

"Oh, shall we not forgive the dear penitent?" said Mrs. Temple. "We must, we will, my love; she is willing to return, and "tis our duty to receive her." "Father of mercy," faid Mr. Eldridge, raifing his clasped hands, "let me but live once more to see the dear wanderer restored to her afflicted parents, and take me from this world of forrow whenever it seemeth best to thy wisdom."

"Yes, we will receive her," faid Mr. Temple; "we will endeavor to heal her wounded fpirit, and speak peace and comfort to her agitated foul. I will write to her to return immediately."

"Oh!" faid Mrs. Temple, "I would, if possible, fly to her, support and chear the dear sufferer in the approaching hour of distress, and tell her how nearly penitence is allied to virtue. Cannot we go and conduct her home, my love?" continued she, laying her hand on his arm. "My father will surely forgive our absence if we go to bring home his darling."

"You cannot go, my Lucy," faid Mr. Temple: "the delicacy of your frame would but poorly fustain the fatigue of a long voyage; but I will go and bring the gentle penitent to your arms: we may still see many years of happiness."

The struggle in the bosom of Mrs. Temple between maternal and conjugal tenderness was long and painful. At length the former triumphed, and the confented that her hufband should fet forward to New-York by the first opportunity: she wrote to her Charlotte in the tenderest, most confoling manner, and looked forward to the happy hour, when she should again embrace her with the most animated hope.

154 CHARLOTTE,

EHAPTER XXVI.

WHAT MIGHT BE EXPECTED.

In the mean time the passion Montraville had conceived for Julia Franklin daily encreased, and he saw evidently how much he was beloved by that amiable girl: he was likewise strongly prepossessed with an idea of Charlotte's persidy. What wonder then is he gave himself up to the delightful sensation which pervaded his bosom; and finding no obstacle arise to oppose his happiness, he folicited and obtained the hand of Julia. A few days before his marriage he thus addressed Belcour:

"Though Charlotte, by her abandoned conduct, has thrown herfelf from my protection, I still hold myself bound to support her till relieved from her present condition, and also to provide for the child. I do not intend to see her again, but I will place a sum of money in your hands, which will amply supplyher withevery convenience; but should fhe require more, let her have it, and I will fee it repaid. I wish I could prevail on the poor deluded girl to return to her friends: She was an only child, and I make no doubt but that they would joyfully receive her; it would shock me greatly to see her henceforth leading a life of infamy, as I should always accuse myself of being the primary cause of all her errors. If she should choose to remain under your protection, be kind to her, Belcour, I conjure you. Let not fatiety prompt you to treat her in such a manner, as may drive her to actions which necessity might urge her to, while her better reason disapproved them: fhe shall never want a friend while I live, but I never more defire to behold her; her prefence would be always painful to me, and a glance from her eye would call the blush of conscious guilt into my cheek .-- I will write a letter to her, which you may deliver when I am gone, as I shall go to St. Eustatia the day after my union with Julia, who will accompany me."

Belcour promifed to fulfil the request of his friend, though nothing was farther from his intentions, than the least design of delivering the letter, or making Charlotte acquainted with the provision Montraville had made for her; he was bent on the complete ruin of the unhappy girl, and supposed by reducing her to an entire dependance on him, to bring her by degrees to confent to gratify his ungenerous pation.

The evening before the day appointed for the nuptials of Montraville and Julia, the former retired early to his apartment: and ruminating on the past scenes of his life, suffered the keenest remorfe in the remembrance of Charlotte's feduction. "Poor girl," faid he, "I will at least write and bid her adieu; I will too endeavor to awaken that love of virtue in her bosom which her unfortunate attachmentto me has extinguished." Hetook up the pen and began to write, but words were denied him. How could he address the woman whom he had feduced, and whom, though he thought unworthy his tendernefs, he was about to bid adieu forever? How fhould he tell her that he was going to abjure her, to enter into the most indissoluble ties with another, and that he could not even own the infant which fhe bore as his child? Several letters were begun and destroyed: at length he completed the following:

TO CHARLOTTE.

"Though I have taken up my pen to address you, my poor injured girl, I feel I am inadequate to the task; yet, however painful the endeavor, I could not resolve upon leaving you forever without one kind line to bid you adieu, to tell you how my heart bleeds at the remembrance of what you was, before you faw the hatred Montraville. Even now imagination paints the scene, when, torn by contending passions, when, struggling between love and duty, you fainted in my arms, and I listed you into the chaise: I see the agony of your mind, when, recovering, you found yourself on the road to Portsmouth: but how, my gentle girl, how could you, when so justly impressed with the value of virtue, how could you, when loving as I thought you loved me, yield to the solicitation of Belcour?

"Oh Charlotte, conscience tells me it was I, villain that I am, who first taught you the allurements of guilty pleasure; it was I who dragged you from the calm repose which innocence and virtue ever enjoy; and can I, dare I tell you, it was not love prompted to the horrid deed? No, thou dear fallen angel, believe your repentant Montraville, when he tells you, the man who truly loves, will never betray the object of his affection.... Adieu, Charlotte: could you still find charms in a life of unoffending innocence, return to your parents; you shall never want the means of support both for yourfelf and child. Oh! gracious heaven! may that child be entirely free from the vices of its father and the weakness of its mother.

"To-morrow....but no, I cannot tell you what to-morrow will produce; Belcour will inform you; he also has cash for you, which

I beg you will ask for whenever you may want it. Once more adieu: believe me, could I hear you was returned to your friends, and enjoying that tranquillity of which I have robbed you, I should be as completely happy as even you, in your fondest hours, could wish me, but till then a gloom will obscure the brightest prospects of

MONTRAVILLE."

After he had fealed this letter he threw himfelf on the bed, and enjoyed a few hours repose. Early in the morning Belcour tapped at his door: he arose hastily, and prepared to meet his Julia at the altar.

"This is the letter to Charlotte," faid he, giving it to Belcour: "take it to her when we are gone to Eustatia; and I conjure you, my dear friend, not to use any sophilastic arguments to prevent her return to virtue; but should she incline that way, encourage her in the thought, and affish her to put her deafign in execution."

CHAPTER XXVII.

Pensive she mourn'd, and hung her languid head. Like a fair lily overcharg'd with dew.

CHARLOTTE had now been left almost three months a prey to her own melancholy reflections....fad companions indeed: nor did any one break in upon her folitude but Belcour, who once or twice called to enquire after her health, and tell her he had in vain endeavored to bring Montraville to hear reason: and once, but only once, was her mindcheared by the receipt of an affectionate letter from Mrs. Beauchamp. Often had fhe wrote to her perfidious feducer, and with the most persuasive eloquence endeavored to convince him of her innocence; but these letters were never fuffered to reach the hands of Montraville, or they must, though on the very eve of marriage, have prevented his deferting the wretched girl. Real anguish of heart had in a great measure faded her charms, her cheeks were pale from want of rest, and her eyes, by frequent, indeed almost continued weeping, were funk and heavy. Sometimes a gleam of hope would play about her heart when she thought of her parents...." They cannot surely," she would say, "refuse to forgive me; or should they deny their pardon to me, they will not hate my innocent infant on account of its mother's errors." How often did the poor mourner wish for the consoling presence of the benevolent Mrs. Beauchamp. "If she was here," she would cry, "she would certainly comfort me, and sooth the distraction of my foul."

She was fitting one afternoon, wrapped in these melancholy resections, when she was interrupted by the entrance of Belcour; great as the alteration was which incessant sorrow had made on her person, she was still interesting, still charming; and the unhallowed slame, which had urged Belcour to plant dissention between her and Montraville, still raged in his bosom; he was determined if possible to make her his mistres; nay, he had even conceived the diabolical scheme of taking her to New-York, and making her appear in every public place where it was likely she should meet Montraville, that he might be a witness to his unmanly triumph.

Whenheentered the room where Charlotte was fitting, he affumed the look of tender, confolatory friendship. "And how does my lovely Charlotte?" faid he, taking her hand: "I fear you are not fo well as I could wish."

"I am not well, Mr. Beleour," faid she, "very far from it; but the pains and infirmities of the body I could easily bear, nay, submit to them with patience, were they not aggravated by the most insupportable anguish of my mind."

"You are not happy, Charlotte," faid he, with a look of well-diffembled forrow.

"Alas!" replied she mournfully, shaking her head, "how can I be happy, deserted and for saken as I am, without a friend of my own sex to whom I can unburthen my full heart, nay, my fidelity suspected by the very man for whom I have facrificed every thing valuable in life, for whom I have made myself a poor despised creature, an outcast from society, an object only of contempt and pity."

"You think too meanly of yourself, Miss Temple: there is no one who would dare to treat you with contempt: all who have the pleasure of knowing you must admire and esteem. You are lonely here, my dear girl; give me leave to conduct you to New-York, where the agreeable society of some ladies, to whom I will introduce you, will dispet these sad thoughts, and I shall again see returning chearfulness, animate those lovely seatures."

[&]quot;Oh, never! never!" cried Charlotte, emphatically; "the virtuous part of my fexwill fcorn me, and I will never affociate with infamy. No, Belcour, here let me hide my fhame and forrow, here let me fpend my few remaining days in obfcurity, unknown and unpitied; here let me die unlamented, and my name fink to oblivion." Here her tears flopped her utterance. Belcour was awed. to filence; he dared not interrupt her; and after a moment's paufe she proceeded..." I once had conceived the thought of going to-New-York, to feek out the still dear, though cruel, ungenerous Montraville, to throw myfelf at his feet, and entreat his compassion; heaven knows, not for myfelf; if I am no: longer beloved, I will not be indebted to his pity to redrefs my injuries, but I would have knelt and entreated him not to forfake my poor unborn....." She could fay no more; a crimfon glow rushed over her cheeks, and covering her face with her hands, she fobbed aloud.

Something like humanity was awakened in Belcour's breaft by this pathetic speech: he arose and walked towards the window; but the selfish passion which had taken possession of his heart, soon stilled these since emotions: and he thought if Charlotte was once convinced she had no longer any dependance on Montraville, she would more readily throw herself on his protection. Determined, therefore, to inform her of all that had happened, he again refumed his feat; and finding the began to be more composed, enquired if the had ever heard from Montraville fince the unfortunate rencontre in her bed chamber.

"Ah no," faid she. "I fear I shall never hear from him again."

"I am greatly of your opinion," faid Belcour, "for he has been for fome time past greatly attached-"

At the word "attached" a death-like paleness overspread the countenance of Charlotte, but fhe applied to fome hartfhorn which flood beside her, and Belcour proceeded.

"He has been for fome time past greatly attached to one Miss Franklin, a pleasing lively girl, with a large fortune."

"She may be richer, may be handfomer," cried Charlotte, "but cannot love him fo well. O! may she beware of his art, and not trust him too far, as I have done."

"He addresses her publicly," faid he, " and it was rumored they were to be married before he failed for Eustatia, whither his company is ordered."

"Belcour," faid Charlotte, feizing his hand, and gazing at him earneftly, while her pale lips trembled with convulfive agony, "tell me, and tell me truly, I befeech you, do you think he can be fuch a villain as to marry another woman, and leave me to die with want and mifery in a ftrange land? tell me what you think; I can bear it very well; I will not fhrink from this heaviest stroke of fate; I have deserved my afflictions, and I will endeavor to bear them as I ought."

- "I fear," faid Belcour, "he can be that villain."
- "Perhaps," cried she, eagerly interrupting him, "perhaps he is married already: come, let me know the worst," continued she, with an affected look of composure: "you need not be afraid, I shall not send the fortunate lady a bowl of poison."
- "Well then, my dear girl," faid he, deceived by her appearance, "they were married on Thursday, and yesterday morning they failed for Eustatia."
- "Married....gone....fay you?" cried fhe in a distracted accent, "what without a last farewel, without one thought on my unhappy situation! Oh Montraville, may God forgive your persidy." She shrieked, and Belcour sprang forward just in time to prevent her falling to the floor.

Alarming faintings now fucceeded each other, and she was conveyed to her bed, from whence she earnestly prayed she might never more arise. Belcour staid with her that night, and in the morning found her in a high fever. The fits she had been seized with had greatly terrified him; and confined as fhe now was to a bed of fickness, she was no longer an object of defire: it is true for feveral days he went conftantly to fee her, but her pale, emaciated appearance difgusted him: his visits became less frequent; he forgot the folemn charge given him by Montraville; he even forgot the money entrusted to his care; and, the burning blush of indignation and shame tinges my cheek while I write it, this disgrace to humanity and manhood at length forgot even the injured Charlotte; and, attracted by the blooming health of a farmer's daughter, whom he had feen in his frequent excursions to the country, he left the unhappy girl to fink unnoticed to the grave, a prey to fickness, grief and penury; while he, having triumphed over the virtue of the artless cottager, riotted in all the intemperance of luxury and lawless pleasure.

en 'n'

CHAPTER XXVIII.

A TRIFLING RETROSPECT.

"RLESS my heart," cries my young, volatile reader, "I shall never have patience to get through these volumes; there are so many ahs! and ohs! fo much fainting, tears, and diffress, I am lick to death of the subject." My dear, chearful, innocent girl, for innocent I will fuppose you to be, or you would acutely feel the woes of Chatlotte, did conscience say, thus might have it been with me, had not Providence interposed to fnatch me from destruction: therefore, my lively, innocent girl, I must request your patience: I am writing a tale of truth: I mean to write it to the heart: but if perchance the heart is rendered impenetrable by unbounded prosperity, or a continuance in vice, I expect not my tale to please, nay, I even expect it will be thrown by with difgust. But fostly, gentle fair one; I pray you throw it not afide till you have perused the whole; mayhap you may find fomething therein to repay you for the trouble. Methinks I fee a farcaftic fmile fit on your countenance.... "And what," cry you, "does the conceited author fuppose we can glean from these pages, if Charlotte is held up as an object of terror, to prevent us from falling into guilty errors? does not La Rue triumph in her shame, and by adding art to guilt, obtain the affection of a worthy man, and rife to a flation where she is beheld with respect, and chearfully received into all companies. What then is the moral you would inculcate? Would you wish us to think that a deviation from virtue, if covered by art and hypocrify, is not an object of detestation, but on the contrary shall raife us to fame and honor? while the hapless girl who falls a victim to her too great fenfibility, shall be loaded with ignominy and fhame?" No, my fair querift, I mean no fuch thing. Remember the endeavors of the wicked are often fuffered to prosper, that in the end their fall may be attended with more bitterness of heart; while the cup of affliction is poured out for wife and falutary ends, and they who are compelled to drain it even to the bitter dregs, often find comfort at the bottom; the tear of penitence blots their offences from the book of fate, and they rife from the heavy, painful trial, purified and fit for a manfion in the kingdom of eternity.

Yes, my young friends, the tear of compassion shall fall for the fate of Charlotte, while the name of La Rue shall be detested and despised. For Charlotte, the soul melts with sympathy; for La Rue, it feels nothing but horror and contempt. But perhaps your gay hearts would rather sollow the fortunate Mrs. Crayton through the scenes of pleasure and dissipation, in which she was engaged, than listen to the complaints and miseries of Charlotte. I will for once oblige you; I will for once follow her to midnight revels, balls and scenes of gaiety, for in such was fhe constantly engaged.

I have faid her person was lovely; let us add that she was surrounded by splendor and affluence, and he must know but little of the world who can wonder, (however faulty such a woman's conduct,) at her being sollowed by the men, and her company courted by the women: in short, Mrs. Crayton was the universal savorite; she set the fashions, she was toasted by the gentlemen, and copied by the ladies.

Colonel Crayton was a domestic man.... Could he be happy with fuch a woman? impossible! Remonstrance was vain: he might as well have preached to the winds, as endeavor to perfuade her from any action, however ridiculous, on which the had fet her mind: in fhort, after a little ineffectual struggle, he gave up the attempt, and left her to follow the bent of her own inclinations; what those were, I think the reader must have feen enough of her character to form a just idea. Among the number who paid their devotions at her shrine, she singled out one, a young Enfign of mean birth, indifferent education, and weak intellects. How fuch a man came into the army, we hardly can account for, and how he afterwards role to posts of honor is likewife strange and wonderful. But fortune is blind, and fo are those too frequently who have the power of difpenfing her favors: elfe why do we fee fools and knaves at the very top of the wheel, while patient merit finks to the extreme of the oppolite abyls. But we may form a thousand conjectures on this fubject, and yet never hit on the right. Let us therefore endeavor to deferve her fmiles, and whether we fucceed or not, we shall feel more innate satisfaction, than thousands of those who bask in the funfhine of her favor unworthily. But to return to Mrs. Crayton: this young man, whom I shall distinguish by the name of Corydon, was the reigning favorite of her heart. He escorted her to the play, danced with her at every ball, and when indisposition prevented her going out, it was he alone who was permitted to chear the gloomy folitude to which the was obliged to confine herfelf. Did the ever think of poor Charlotte?---if the did, my dear Mifs, it was only to laugh at the poor girl's want of fpirit in confenting to be moped up in the country, while Montraville was enjoying all the pleafures of a gay, diffipated city. When the heard of his marriage, the fmiling faid, fo there's an end of Madam Charlotte's hopes. I wonder who will take her now, or what will become of the little iffeeted prude?

But as you have led to the fubject, I think we may as well return to the diffressed Charlotte, and not like the unsceling Mrs. Crayton, shat our hearts to the call of humanity.

CHAPTER XXIX.

WE GO FORWARD AGAIN.

HE strength of Charlotte's constitution combated against her disorder, and she began flowly to recover, though the flill laboured under a violent depression of spirits: how must that depression be encreased, when, upon examining her little store, she found herfelf reduced to one folitary guinea, and that during her illnefs, the attendance of an apothecary and nurse, together with many other unavoidable expenses, had involved her indebt, from which she saw no method of extricating herfelf. As to the faint hope which flie had entertained of hearing from and being relieved by her parents; it now entirely forfook her, for it was above four months fince her letter was difpatched, and she hadreceived no answer: she therefore imagined that her conduct had either entirely alienated their affection from her, or broken their hearts, and flie must never more liope to receive their bleffing.

Never did any human being wish for death with greater fervency or with juster cause yet she had too just a fense of the duties of the christian religion, to attempt to put a period to her own existence. "I have but to be patient a little longer," she would cry, "and nature, satigued and fainting, will throw off this heavy load of mortality, and I shall be released from all my sufferings."

It was one cold flormy day in the latter end of December, as Charlotte fat by a handful of fire, the low flate of her finances not allowing her to replenish her flock of fuel, and prudence teaching her to be careful of what she had, when she was surprised by the entrance of a farmer's wife, who, without much ceremony, feated herself, and began this curious harangue.

"I'm come to fee if as how you can pay your rent, because as how we hear Captain Montable is gone away, and it's fifty to one if he b'ant killed afore he comes back again; an then, Mis, or Ma'am, or whatever you may be, as I was faying to my husband, where are we to look for our money."

This was a stroke altogether unexpected by Charlotte; she knew so little of the ways of the world, that she had never bestowed a thought on the payment of the rent of the house; she knew indeed that she owed a good deal, but this was never reckoned among the others; she was thunder-struck; she hardly knew what answer to make, yet it was absolutely necessary that she should say something; and judging of the gentleness of every female disposition by her own, she thought the best way to interest the woman in her favor, would be to tell her candidly to what a situation she was reduced, and how little probability there was of her ever paying any body.

Alas poor Charlotte, how/confined was her knowledge of human nature, or she would have been convinced that the only way to enfure the friendship and assistance of your furrounding acquaintance, is to convince them you do not require it, for when once the petrifying afpect of diffress and penury appear, whose qualities, like Medusa's head, can change to stone all that look upon it; when once this Gorgon claims acquaintance with us, the phantom of friendship, that before courted our notice, will vanish into unfubftantial air, and the whole world before us appear a barren waste. Pardon me, ye dear spirits of benevolence, whose benign smiles and chearful-giving hands have ftrewed fweet flowers on many a thorny path through which my wayward fate forced me to pass; think not, that in condemning the unfeeling texture of the human heart, I forget the spring from whence flow all the comforts I enjoy :. ch no! I look up to you as to bright constellations, gathering new splendors from the furrounding darkness: but ah! while I adore the benignant rays that cheared and illumined my heart, I mourn that their influence can not extend to all the fons and daughters of affliction.

"Indeed, Madam," faid poor Charlotte in a tremulous accent, "I am at a lofs what to do. Montraville placed me here, and promifed to defray all my expences; but he has forgotten his promife, he has forfaken me, and I have no friend who has either power or will to relieve me. Let me hope, as you fee my unhappy fituation, your Charity....."

"Charity," cried the woman, impatiently interrupting her, "charity, indeed: why, Mistress, charity begins at home, and I have feven children at home, bonest, lawful children; and it is my duty to keep them; and do you think I shall give away my property to a nasty, impudent hussey, to maintain her and her baftard: as I was faying to my hufband the other day, what will this world come to? honest women are nothing now-a-days, while the harlotings are fet up for fine ladies, and look upon us no more nor the dirt they walk upon; but let me tell you, my fine spoken Ma'am, I must have my money; so seeing as how you can't pay it, why you must troop, and leave all your fine gimeracks and fal de ralls behind you. I don't ask for no more nor my right, and nobody shall dare for to go for to hinder me of it."

- "Oh heavens!" cried Charlotte, clasping her hands, "what will become of me!"
- "Come on ye!" retorted the unfeeling wretch: "why go to the barracks and work for a morfel of bread; wash and mend the soldiers clothes, and cook their victuals, and not expect to live in idleness on honest people's means. Oh I wish I could see the day when all such cattle were obliged to work hard and eat little: it's only what they deferve."
- "Father of mercy," cried Charlotte, "I acknowledge thy correction just: but prepare me, I beseech thee, for the portion of misery thou may'st please to lay before me."
- "Well," faid the woman, "I fhall go and tell my husband as how you can't pay; and so d'ye fee, Ma'am, get ready to be packing away this very night, for you should not stay another night in this house, though I was fure you would lay in the street."

Charlotte bowed her head in filence; but the anguish of her heart was too great to permit her to articulate a single word.

CHAPTER XXX.

And what is friendship but a name,
A charm that lulls to sleep—
A shade that follows wealth and same,
But leaves the wretch to weep?

WHEN Charlotte was left to herfelf, she began to think what course she must take, or to whom fhe could apply, to prevent her perishing for want, or perhaps that very night falling a victim to the inclemency of the feafon. After many perplexed thoughts, flie at last determined to set out for New-York, and enquire out Mrs. Crayton, from whom she had no doubt but fhe should obtain immediate relief, as foon as her diffrefs was made known; she had no sooner formed this resolution, than fhe refolved immediately to put it in execution: fhe therefore wrote the following little billet to Mrs. Crayton, thinking if she should have company with her, it would be better to fend it in than to request to fee her.

To MRS. CRAYTON.

" Madam,

"When we left our native land, that dear happy land which now contains all that is dear to the wretched Charlotte, our prospects were the fame; we both, pardon me, Madam, if I fay, we both too eafily followed the impulse of our treacherous hearts, and trusted our happiness on a tempestuous ocean, where mine has been wrecked and loft forever; you have been more fortunate....you are united to a man of honor and humanity, united by the most facred ties, respected, efteemed, admired, and furrounded by innumerable bleffings, of which I am bereaved enjoying those pleasures which have fled my bosom, never to return; alas! forrow and deep regret have taken their place. Behold me, Madam, a poor forfaken wanderer, who has not were to lay her weary head; wherewith to fupply the wants of nature, or to shield her from the inclemency of the wea-To you I fue, to you I look for pity I ask not to be received as an and relief. intimate or an equal; only for charity's fweet take receive me into your hospitable mantion, allot me the meanest apartment in it, and let me breathe out my foul in prayers for your happiness; I cannot, I feel I cannot long bear up under the accumulated woes that pour in upon me; but oh! my dear Madam, for the love of heaven fuffer me not to expire in the street; and when I am at peace, as foon I shall be, extend your compassion to my helpless offspring, should it please heaven that it should survive its unhappy mother. A gleam of joy breaks in on my benighted foul, while I restect that you cannot, will not, resuse your protection to the heart-broken

CHARLOTTE."

When Charlotte had finished this letter, late as it was in the asternoon, and though the snow began to fall very fast, she tied up a few necessaries which she had prepared against her expected consinement; and, terrified lest she should be again exposed to the insults ofher barbarous landlady, more dreadful to her wounded spirit than either storm or darkness, she set forward for New-York.

It may be asked by those who, in a work of this kind, love to cavil at every trifling emission, whether Charlotte did not possess any valuable of which she could have disposed, and by that means have supported herfelf till Mrs. Beauchamp's return, when she would have been certain of receiving every tender attention which compassion and friendship could dictate; but let me entreat these wise penetrating gentlemen to reslect, that when Charlotte left England, it was in such haste that there was no time to purchase any thing more than what was wanted for immediate use on the voyage; and after her arrival at New-York, Montraville's affection foon began to decline, so that her whole ward-robe consisted only of necessaries; and as to the baubles, with which fond lovers often load their mistresses, she possessed not one, except a plain gold locket of small value, which contained a lock of her mother's hair, and which the greatest extremity of want could not have forced her to part with.

VOL. 2

I hope, Sir, your prejudices are now removed in regard to the probability of my flory? Oh they are. Well then, with your leave, I will proceed.

The distance from the house which our fussering heroine occupied, to New-York, was not very great; yet the snow sell so fast, and the cold was so intense, that being unable from her situation to walk quick, she sound herself almost sinking with cold and satigue before she reached the town; her garments, which were merely suitable to the summer season, being an undress robe of plain white mussin, were wet through; and a thin black cloak and bonnet, very improper habiliments for such a climate, but poorly defended her from the cold. In this situation she reached the city, and enquired of a foot soldier whom she met, the way to Colonel Crayton's.

"Bless you, my fweet lady," faid the reldier, with a voice and look of compassion, "I will show you the way with all my heart; but if you are going to make a petition to Madam Crayton, it is all to no purpose I affure you: if you please, I will conduct you to Mr. Franklin's; though Miss Julia is married and gone now, yet the old gentleman is very good."

"Julia Franklin," faid Charlotte: "is fhe not married to Montraville?"

"Yes," replied the foldier, "and may God bless them; for a better officer never lived, he is so good to us all; and as to Miss Julia, all the poor folks almost worshipped her."

"Gracious heaven," cried Charlotte, "is Montraville then unjust to none but me?"

The foldier now showed her Colonel Crayton's door, and with a beating heart she knocked for admission.

182 C H

immedia

CHAPTER XXXI.

:::: 680 :::::

SUBJECT CONTINUED.

When the door was opened, Charlotte in a voice rendered scarcely articulate, through cold and the extreme agitation of her mind, demanded whether Mrs. Crayton was at home. The servant hesitated: he knew that his lady was engaged at a game of picquet with her dear Corydon, nor could he think she would like to be disturbed by a person whose appearance spoke her of so little consequence as Charlotte; yet there was something in her countenance that rather interested him in her favor, and he said his lady was engaged; but if she had any particular message he would deliver it.

"Take up this letter," faid Charlotte: "tell her the unhappy writer of it waits in her hall for an answer."

The tremulous accent, the tearful eye, must have moved any heart not composed of adamant. The man took the letter from the poor suppliant, and hastily ascended the stair case,

"A letter, Madam," faid he, prefenting it to his lady: an immediate answer is required.

Mrs. Crayton glanced her eye carelefsly: over the contents. "What fluff is this?" eried fhe haughtily; "have I not told you a thousand times that I would not be plagued with beggars, and petitions from people one knows nothing about? Go tell the woman I can't do any thing in it. I'm forry, but one can't relieve every body."

The fervant bowed, and heavily returned with this chilling message to Charlotte.

"Surely," faid fhe, Mrs. Crayton has not read my letter. Go, my good friend, pray go back to her; tell her it is Charlotte Temple who requests beneath her hospitable roof to find shelter from the inclemency of the season."

"Prithee, don't plague me, man," cried Mrs. Crayton impatiently, as the fervant advanced fomething in behalf of the unhappy girl.—"I tell you I don't know her."

"Not know me," cried Charlotte, rushing into the room, (for she had followed the man up stairs) "not know me, not remember the ruined Charlotte Temple, who, but for you; perhaps might still have been innocent, still have been happy! Oh, La Rue, this is beyond every thing I could have believed possible."

"" Upon my honor, Miss," replied the una seeling woman with the utmost effrontery,

"this is a most unaccountable address: it is beyond my comprehension. John," continued she, turning to the fervant, "the young woman is certainly out of her fenses: do pray take her away, she terrifies me to death."

"Oh God," cried Charlotte, clasping her hands in an agony, this is too much; what will become of me? but I will not leave you, they shall not tear me from you; here on my knees I conjure you to save me from perishing in the streets: if you really have forgotten me, oh for charity's sweet sake this night let me be sheltered from the winter's piercing cold."

The kneeling figure of Charlotte in her affecting fituation might have moved the heart of a floic to compassion: but Mrs. Crayton remained inflexible. In vain did Charlotte recount the time they had known each other at Chichester, in vain mention their being in, the same ship, in vain were the names of Montraville and Belcour mentioned. Mrs. Crayton could only say she was forry for her imprudence, but could not think of having her own reputation endangered by encouraging a woman of that kind in her own house; besides she did not know what trouble and expense she might bring upon her husband by giving shelter to a woman in her situation.

"I can at least die here," said Charlotte,
"I feel I cannot long survive this dreadful!"
conslict. Father of mercy, here let me finisher.

my existence." Her agonizing sensations overpowered her, and she fell senseless on the floor.

"Take her away," faid Mrs. Crayton, "fhe will really frighten me into hysterics; take her away, I say, this instant."

"And where must I take the poor creature?" faid the fervant with a voice and look of compaffion.

"Any where," cried she hastily, "only don't let me ever fee her again. I declare she has flurried me fo, I shan't be myself again this fortnight."

John, affisted by his fellow-fervant, raised and carried her down flairs. "Poor foul," faid he, "you shall not lie in the street this I have a bed and a poor little hovel, where my wife and her little ones rest them; but they shall watch to-night, and you shall be sheltered from danger." They placed her in a chair; and the benevolent man, affifted by one of his comrades, carried her to the place where his wife and children lived. A furgeon was fent for: he bled her; she gave figns of returning life; and before the dawn, gave birth to a female infant, After this event the lav for fome hours in a kind of flupor; and if at any time she spoke, it was with a quickness and incoherence that plainly eyinced the total deprivation of her reason.

CHAPTER XXXII.

REASONS WHY AND WHEREFORE.

THE reader of fensibility may perhaps be assonished to find Mrs. Crayton could fo pofitively deny any knowledge of Charlotte; it's is therefore but just that her conduct should in some measure be accounted for. She had ever been fully fenfible of the fuperiority. of Charlotte's fense and virtue; she was conscious that she would never have swerved from rectitude, had it not been for her bad precepts and worse example. These were things as yet unknown to her husband; and she wished not to have that part of her conduct exposed to him, as she had great reason to fear the had already loft confiderable part of that power she once maintained over him. She trembled while Charlotte was in the house, lest the Colonel should return; she perfectly well remembered how much he feemed interested in her favor, while on their paffage from England, and made no doubt, but, should he see her in her present diffress, he would offer her an afylum, and protect, her to the utmost of his power. In that case: she feared the unguarded nature of Charlotte, might discover to the Colonel the part she had taken in the unhappy girl's elopement; and she well knew the contrast between her own and Charlotte's conduct would make the former appear in no very respectable light. Had she reslected properly, she would have afforded the poor girl protection; and by enjoining her silence, ensured it by acts of repeated kindness; but vice in general blinds its votaries, and they discover their real characters to the world, when they are most studious to preserve appearances.

Just so it happened with Mrs. Crayton: her fervants made no fcruple of mentioning the cruel conduct of their lady to a poor diftressed lunatic who claimed her protection; every one joined in reprobating her inhumanity; nay, even Corydon thought she might at least have ordered her to be taken care of, but he dare not even hint it to her, for he lived but in her fmiles, and drew from her lavish fondness large sums to support an extravagance to which the flate of his own finances was very inadequate; it cannot therefore be supposed that he wished Mrs. Crayton to be very liberal in her bounty to the afflicted fuppliant; yet vice had not fo entirely feared over his heart, but the forrows of Charlotte could find a vulnerable part.

Charlotte had now been three days with her humane preservers, but she was totally insensible of every thing: she raved ineessantly for Montraville and her father: she was not conscious of being a mother, nor took the least notice of her child, except to ask whose it was, and why it was not carried to its parents.

"Oh," faid she one day starting up on hearing the infant cry, "why, why will you keep that child here? I am sure you would not if you knew how hard it was for a mother to be parted from her infant: it is like tearing the cords of life asunder. Oh could you see the horrid sight which I now behold—there—there stands my dear mother, her poor bosom bleeding at every vein, her gentle, assectionate heart torn in a thousand pieces, and all for the loss of a ruined, ungrateful child. Save me—save me— from her frown. I dare not—indeed I dare not speak to her."

Such were the dreadful images that haunted her distracted mind, and nature was sinking fast under the the dreadful malady which medicine had no power to remove. The surgeon who attended her was a humane man; he exerted his utmost abilities to save her; but he saw she was in want of many necessaries and comforts, which the poverty of her hospitable host rendered him unable to provide: he therefore determined to make her fituation known to fome of the officers' ladies, and endeavor to make a collection for her relief.

When he returned home, after making this resolution, he sound a message from Mrs. Beauchamp, who had just arrived from Rhode-Island, requesting he would call and see one of her children, who was very unwell. "I do not know," said he, as he was hastening to obey the summons, "I do not know a woman to whom I could apply with more hope of success than Mrs. Beauchamp. I will endeavor to interest her in this poor girl's behalf; she wants the foothing balm of friendly consolation: we may perhaps save her; we will try at least."

"And where is fhe," cried Mrs. Beauchamp, when he had prescribed something for the child, and told his little pathetic tale, "where is she, Sir? we will go to her immediately. Heaven forbid that I should be deaf to the calls of humanity. Come, we will go this instant." Then seizing the doctor's arm, they sought the habitation that contained the dying Charlotte.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

WHICH PEOPLE VOID OF FEELING NEED NOT READ.

WHEN Mrs. Beauchamp entered the apartment of the poor fufferer, she started back with horror. On a wretched bed without hangings, and but poorly supplied with covering, lay the emaciated figure of what still retained the semblance of a lovely woman, though fickness had so altered her features that Mrs. Beauchamp had not the least recollection of her person. In one corner of the room flood a woman washing, and, shivering over a fmall fire, two healthy but half naked children: the infant was affeep beside its mother, and, on a chair by the bed-fide, flood a porrenger and wooden spoon, containing a little gruel, and a tea-cup with about two spoon-fulls of wine in it. Mrs. Beauchamp had never before beheld fuch a fcene of poverty; fhe fhuddered involuntarily, and exclaiming---"heaven preferve us!" leaned on the back of a chair ready to fink to the earth. The doctor repented having so precipitately brought her into this affecting fcene; but there was no time for apologies: Charlotte caught the found of her voice, and starting almost out of bed, exclaimed ... "Angel of peace and mercy, art thou come to deliver me? Oh, I know you are, for whenever you VOL. 2.

was near me, I felt cased of half my forrows; but you don't know me, nor can I, with all the recollection I am mistress of, remember your name just now; but I know that benevolent countenance, and the softness of that voice, which has so often comforted the wretched Charlotte."

Mrs. Beauchamp had, during the time Charlotte was fpeaking, feated herfelf on the bed and taken one of her hands: fhe looked at her attentively, and at the name of Charlette the perfectly conceived the whole flocking affair. A faint sickness came over her. "Gracious heaven," faid fhe, "is this poffi-ble?" and burfling into tears, fhe reclined the burning head of Charlotte on her own bosom; and folding her arms about her, wept over her in silence. "Oh," said Charlotte, "you are very good to weep thus for me: it is a long time fince I shed a tear for myself: my head and heart are both on fire; but these tears of your's seem to cool and refresh me. Oh now I remember you said you would fend a letter to my poor father: do you think he ever received it? or perhaps you have brought me an answer: why don't vou fpeak, Madam? Does he fay I may go home? Well he is very good; I shall foon be ready."

She then made an effort to get out of bed; but, being prevented, her phrenzy again returned, and the raved with the greatest wildness and incoherence. Mrs. Beauchamp, and ing it was impossible for her to be removed, contented herself with ordering the apartment to be made more comfortable, and procuring a proper nurse for both mother and child; and having learnt the particulars of Charlotte's fruitless application to Mrs. Crayton from honest John, she amply rewarded him for his benevolence, and returned home with a heart oppressed with many painful sensations, but yet rendered easy by the reflection that she had performed her duty towards a distressed sellow-creature.

Early the next morning fhe again vifited Charlotte, and found her tolerably composed: she called her by name, thanked her for her goodness, and when her child was brought to her, pressed it in her arms, wept over it, and called it the offspring of disobedience. Mrs. Beauchamp was delighted to see her so much amended, and began to hope she might recover, and, spite of her former errors, become an useful and respectable member of society; but the arrival of the doctor put an end to these delusive hopes; he said nature was making her last effort, and a few hours would most probably consign the unhappy girl to her kindred dust."

Being asked how the found herself, she replied.... Why better, much better, Doctor. I hope now I have but little more to suffer. I had last night a few hours sleep, and when I awoke recovered the full power of recollection. I am quite sensible of my weakness; I seel I have but little longer to combat with the shafts of affliction. I have an humble confidence in the mercy of him who die i to fave the world, and trust that my fufferings in this state of mortality, joined to my unfeigned repentance, through his mercy, have blotted my offences from the fight of my offended maker. I have but one care-my poor infant! Father of mercy, continued the, raising her eyes, " of thy infinite goodness, grant that the fins of the parent be not visited on the unoffending child. May those who taught me to despise thy laws be forgiven; lay not my offences to their charge, I befeech thee; and oh! shower the choicest of thy blessings on those whose pity has foothed the afflicted heart, and made eafy even the bed of pain and fickness."

She was exhausted by this fervent address to the throne of mercy, and though her lips still moved, her voice became inarticulate; she lay for some time as it were in a dose, and then recovering, faintly pressed Mrs. Beauchamp's hand, and requested that a clergyman might be fent for.

On his arrival, she joined fervently in the pious office, frequently mentioning her ingratitude to her parents as what lay most heavy at her heart. When she had performed the last folemn duty, and was preparing to lie down, a little bustle outside of the door occasioned Mrs. Beauchamp to open it and enquire the cause. A man in appearance about forty, prefented himfelf, and asked for Mrs. Beauchamp.

"That is my name, Sir," faid fhe.

"Oh then, my dear Madam," cried he, tell me where I may find my poor, ruined, but repentant child."

Mrs. Beauchamp was furprized and affected; fhe knew not what to fay; the forefaw the agony this interview would occasion Mr. Temple, who had just arrived in fearch of his Charlotte, and yet was feusible that the pardon and blessing of her father would soften even the agonies of death to the daughter.

She hesitated. "Tell me, Madam," cried he wildly, "tell me, I beseech thee, does she live? shall I see my darling once again? Perhaps she is in this house. Lead, lead me to her, that I may bless her, and then lie down and die."

The ardent manner in which he uttered these words occasioned him to raise his voice. It caught the ear of Charlotte: she knew the beloved sound: and uttering a loud shriek, she sprang forward as Mr. Temple entered the room. "My adored father!" "My long-lost child!" Nature could support no more, and they both sunk lifeless into the arms of the attendants.

Charlotte was again put into bed, and a few moments reftored Mr. Temple: but to-describe the agony of his sufferings is past the power of any one. Though we may readily conceive, we cannot delineate the dreadful fcene. Every eye gave testimony of what each heart selt—but all were silent.

When Charlotte recovered, fhe found herfelf fupported in her father's arms. She eaft on him a most expressive look, but was unable to speak. A reviving cordial was administered. She then asked, in a low voice for her child: it was brought to her: she put it in her father's arms. "Protect her," faid she, "and bless your dying—"

Unable to finish the sentence, she sunk back on her pillow; her countenance was serenely composed; she regarded her father as he pressed the infant to his breast with a stedsast look; a sudden beam of joy passed across her languid features, she raised her eyes to heaven—and then closed them for ever.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

RETRIBUTION.

In the mean time, Montraville having received orders to return to New-York, arrived, and having still some remains of compassionate tenderness for the woman whom he regarded as brought to shame by himself, he went out in search of Belcour, to enquire whether she was safe, and whether the child lived. He found him immerfed in diffipation, and could gain no other intelligence than that Charlotte had left him, and that he knew not what had become of her.

"I cannot believe it possible" faid Montraville, "that a mind once so pure as Charlotte Temple's, should so suddenly become the mansion of vice. Beware, Belcour," continued he, "beware if you have dared to behave either unjustly or dishonorably to that poor girl, your life shall pay the forseit: I will revenge her cause."

He immediately went into the country, to the house where he had left Charlotte. It was desolate. After much enquiry, he at length sound the servant girl who had lived with her. From her he learned the misery Charlotte had endured from the complicated evils of illness, poverty, and a broken heart, and that she had set out on foot for New-York, on a cold winter's evening; but she could inform him no further.

Tortured almost to madness by this shocking account, he returned to the city; but before he reached it, the evening was drawing to a close. In entering the town, he was obliged to pass several little huts, the residence of poor women, who supported themselves by washing the clothes of the officers and soldiers. It was nearly dark: he heard from a neighboring steeple, a solemn toll that seemed to say, some poor mortal was going to their last mansion; the sound struck on the heart of Montraville, and he involuntarily stopped, when, from one of the houses he faw the appearance of a funeral. Almost unknowing what he did, he followed at a fmall distance; and as they let the cossin into the grave, he enquired of a foldier who food by, and had just wiped off a tear that did honor to his heart, who it was that was just buried. "An please your honor," said the man, "'tis a poor girl that was brought from her friends by a cruel man, who left her when she was big with child, and married another." Montraville flood motionless, and the man proceeded-"I met her myfelf not a fortnight fince, one night all wet and cold in the fireet; fhe went to Madam Crayton's, but fhe would not take her in, and fo the poor thing went raving mad." Montraville could bear no more; he struck his hands against his forehead with violence; and exclaiming "poor murdered Charlotte!" ran with precipitation towards the place where they were heaping the earth on her remains. . "Hold, hold, one moment," faid he. "Close not the grave of the injured Charlotte Temple till I have taken vengeance on her murderer."

"Rath young man," faid Mr. Temple, "who art thou, that thus diffurbeft the laft mournful rites of the dead, and rudely breakelt in upon the grief of an afflicted father?"

"If thou art the father of Charlotte Temple," faid he, gazing at him with mingled horror and amazement—" if thou art her faher—I am Montraville." The n falling on his knees, he continued—"Here is my bofom. I bare it to receive the stroke I merit. Strike—strike now, and save me from the mifery of reflection."

" Alas!" faid Mr. Temple, "if thou wert the feducer of my child, thy own reflections be thy punishment. I wrest not the power from the hand of omnipotence. Look on that little heap of earth, there hast thou buried the only joy of a fond father. Look at it often; and may thy heart feel fuch true forrow as shall merit the mercy of heaven." He turned from him; and Montraville starting up from the ground where he had thrown himself, and that instant remembering the perfidy of Belcour, flew like lightning to his lodgings. Belcour was intoxicated; Montraville impetuous: they fought, and the fword of the latter entered the heart of hisadverfary. He fell, and expired almost instantly. Montraville had received a flight wound; and overcome with the agitation of his mind and lofs of blood, was carried in a flate of infenfibility to his diffracted wife. A dangerous iliness and obstinate delirium ensued, during which he raved inceffantly for Charlotte: but a ftrong conflitution, and the tender affiduities of Julia, in time overcame the difor-He recovered; but to the end of his life was subject to severe fits of melancholy, and while he remained at New-York, frequently retired to the church-yard, where he would weep over the grave, and regret the untimely fate of the lovely Charlotte Temple.

GHAPTER XXXV.

CONCLUSION.

Shortly after the interment of his daughter, Mr. Temple, with his dear little charge and her nurse, set forward for England. It would be impossible to do justice to the meeting scene between him, his Lucy, and her aged father. Every heart of sensibility can easily conceive their seelings. After the first tumult of grief was subsided, Mrs. Temple gave up the chief of her time to her grandchild, and as she grow up and improved, began to almost fancy she again pessessed her Charlotte.

It was about ten years after these painful events, that Mr. and Mrs. Temple, having buried their father, were obliged to come to London on particular business, and brought the little Lucy with them. They had been walking one evening, when on their return they found a poor wretch sitting on the steps of the door. She attempted to rise as they approached; but from extreme weakness was unable, and after several fruitless essorts sell back in a sit. Mr. Temple was not one of those men who stand to consider whether by assisting an object in distress they shall not inconvenience themselves, but instigated by the impulse of a noble seeling heart, immediately ordered her to be carried into the house, and proper restoratives applied.

She foon recovered; and fixing her eyes on Mrs. Temple, cried—"you know not, Madam, what you do; you know not whom you are relieving, or you would curse me in the bitterness of your heart. Come not near me, Madam; I shall contaminate you. I am the viper that stung your peace. I am the woman who turned the poor Charlotte out to perish in the street. Heaven have mercy! I see her now," continued she, looking at Lucy; "such, such was the fair bud of innocence, that my vile arts blasted ere it was half blown."

It was in vain that Mr. and Mrs. Temple intreated her to be composed and to take some refreshment. She only drank half a glass of wine; and then told them that she had been separated from her husband seven years, the chief of which she had passed in riot, distipation and vice, till, overtaken by poverty and sickness, she had been reduced to part with every valuable, and thought only of ending her life in a prison, when abenevolent friend paid her debts and released her; but that her illness increasing, she had no possible means of supporting herself, and her friends were weary of relieving her. "I have safted," faid fhe, "two days, and last night laid my aching head on the cold pavement; indeed it was but just that I should experience those miseries myself, which I had unseelingly inflicted on others."

204 CHARLOTTE.

Greatly as Mr. Temple had reason to detest Mrs. Crayton, he could not behold her in this distress without some emotions of pity. He gave her shelter that night beneath his hospitable roof, and the next day got her admission into an hospital; where having lingured a few weeks, she died, a striking example, that vice, however prosperous in the beginning, in the end leads only to misery and shame.

